The F. B. Warren Corporation will release "The Girl from God's Country."

The story opens in the North Woods, where Neeka, a girl of the great outdoors, meets a hunting party that includes J. R. Carslake, millionaire airplane manufacturer, who many years before had eloped with Neeka's mother, and at the birth of Neeka had discarded the mother and her babe.

Unaware that Carslake is her father, Neeka saves his life when he is on the verge of drowning after his guide shoots a hole in the bottom of the canoe in which they are paddling. The guide, Neeka's grandfather, had sought revenge for the affair in which his daughter paid the penalty.

Carslake adopts Neeka and takes her back to California with his daughter, Marion, who closely resembles Neeka. Carslake is unaware of the fact that Neeka is his real daughter.

The entire country is awaiting the outcome of the proposed trans-Pacific flight, in which Carslake's new airplane and the K-12, owned by Otto Kraus, are entered. The only obstacle standing in the way of Carslake's victory is the want of a fuel supply that will enable his plane to make the trip successfully.

For years Carslake has been cunningly defrauding a crazed inventor of his models, putting them on the market as his own inventions and reaping fortune and fame as a result. This inventor lives in a lonely hut in the sand dunes. Carslake appeals for a formula to be used for the flight and the inventor provides a solidified gasoline which Carslake promptly appropriates for his stolen models.

Kraus, in an effort to learn secrets regarding Carslake's activities, gets work as a butler in the Carslake mansion. While there he gains the confidence of Neeka and cunningly persuades her to obtain the formula for the solidified gasoline from Carslake.

The newspapers of the country carry big stories of the discovery of solidified gasoline and give credit to Carslake. The crazed inventor hears of this and tries to see Carslake, only to be refused admittance at the aero works. He swears revenge, which comes even sooner than he hoped. His mind is restored to normal when the hangar of the Carslake plant is set afire, and he is rescued by Neeka in the nick of time.

Neeka, after getting the formula for Kraus, realizes that she has been duped into treason against her benefactor.

Kraus has departed in a plane and Neeka follows in pursuit.

A thrilling battle in mid-air is enacted and Neeka is forced to make a sensational leap in a parachute when the wing of her plane is broken.

The story ends in a manner better seen in the picture than told here.
