AT the Palace Hotel, Battlesburg, Iowa, "Blackie" Daw, the pal of J. Rufus Wallingford, is doing the preliminary work in the scheme of swindling the townspeople. He blazes the way for Wallingford's coming and has the entire town excited as a result of his stories about the remarkable financier coming there to invest.

Wallingford arrives at dinner time. There is a remarkable impromptu demonstration in his honor. It is understood that Wallingford is to do big things in the line of manufacturing, traction operation and real estate, and although he and "Blackie" are practically broke they have no difficulty in obtaining whatever they want.

When the two crooks get together in private they consider what it is they will pretend to offer for manufacture and they decide to make cloth-covered carpet tacks. With tacks, cloth and glue some samples are prepared. The Universal Covered Carpet Tack Company is incorporated at $500,000, and everybody in town is anxious to invest.

Wallingford continues to make a great splurge, buying the best available car, without paying any cash, giving a great banquet, etc. He engages Fannie Jasper as his secretary. Fannie comes to the quick conclusion that Wallingford and "Blackie" are a pair of crooks and she says so, but Wallingford convinces her that she is mistaken.

Eddie Lamb is sent out as a drummer to sell the tacks that the company proposed to manufacture. Facory facilities are obtained. Wallingford fixes the way for a big cleanup and the getaway.

The stockholders become suspicious and demand an accounting. Walilngford meets them and convinces them that they are wrong and unjust to him. The townspeople are dazzled by the large options that Wallingford takes on real estate previously regarded as of no value. A real boom begins.

The crooks get $150,000 out of the real estate juggling and plan to leave with a quarter of a million. Wallingford and "Blackie" have both fallen in love with Battlesburg girls and they hate to leave.

Suddenly the president of the Midland Valley Traction System arrives. He has a business talk with Wallingford. He says that his syndicate is extending its operations and wants to buy the line that Wallingford is projecting. Wallingford asks a million dollars for his proposed line and demands payment of a half a million before seriously entering into the deal and he gets it.

Eddie Lamb, sent out on the supposedly foolish task of trying to sell the tack to the trade, returns with orders for more than a hundred thousand gross of the new tacks, to be shipped as soon as possible, and at a better price than the company had decided upon.

Wallingford and "Blackie" nearly collapse at this news. They are both rich. They are both honest men—without having had any intention of becoming such, and at the close of the story, both are honored millionaires, men of great importance in Battlesburg, married and have happy homes.
