The Story

INSPECTOR KILLBRIDE of the Northwest Mounted Police was the sternest disciplinarian in the service, and when he told Molly, his daughter, that he wanted her to marry Morgan, the son of an influential citizen in the wilderness of the north in which they lived, he naturally expected that she would do it.

Perhaps Molly might have married Morgan had it not been for Jerry Burke, one of her father's men and a devil-may-care man-hunter of the scarlet-coated service. Jerry loved her, and she knew it. Morgan said that he loved her, but she didn't know it.

Jerry galloped through the woods one day, when he met Morgan. "If you didn't have on that uniform Mollie would never look at you," he taunted. Jerry promptly took off his insignia and was beating Morgan to a pulp when a blow from behind knocked him unconscious. A second later Morgan fell, wounded with a bullet through the chest. Jerry was accused of shooting him and arrested.

Half-breed's Story

Jules, a half-breed, worshiped Jerry and tried to collect his scattered wits long enough to tell Inspector Killbride that an outlaw, under orders of Hanley, their leader, knocked Jerry out from behind, snatched his gun and shot Morgan as a plot to discredit Jerry in the service and cause his dismissal, but he was too frightened. He did, however, get the word to Jerry, who, as his mind cleared from the blow, recalled facts to substantiate it, and set out after Hanley.

In the time of Jerry's disgrace Morgan regained favor with Mollie and got her to promise that she would give him an answer on the day following.

While Morgan was pressing his suit with the girl, Jerry was galloping over a fresh trail, left by Hanley and a half-breed Indian girl with whom he fled.

Get Your Man

He found him in a desolate part of the woods, and after a terrific battle brought him back to the barracks. As he entered Jules, the half-breed, was telling the inspector more coherently of the shooting. A man arrested with the Indian on suspicion verified the story.

"Did you know this?" Mollie asked Morgan.

He admitted that he did. She gave him his answer without further delay, and sent him away, never to return.

As they stood at the inspector's desk, Jerry staggered in with his prisoner. The inspector told him that he had upheld the best traditions of the service and indicated that Mollie was in need of such a man.
