"The Man Who Woke Up"

Jones	Hoot Gibson
Wade Hardine	Chas. Inslee
His niece, Rose	Marcella Pershing
Tucker	Art Ortega
Downs	Kansas Moehring
Pop	Jack Walters
Lanky	Wm. Engle

"TOO TIRED JONES," a cowboy with vast and promising cattle interests is a victim of inertia and indifference. So much so that two rustlers of the names of Tucker and Downs are rapidly depleting Jones' band of horses, and they find hazardous work made easy because Jones is too lazy to trail or fight them.

Not so with Wade Harding. His ranch adjoins that of "Too Tired Jones," and whenever the rustlers invaded his domain and took his stock, he bargied and blamed Jones for it, and then started out with a purse to overtake the thieves. [illegible]

[illegible] Jones. When she is introduced to him the sandy surveys Jones' personal appearance and tells him he evidently takes no pride in it. This humiliation happens before the saloon in the presence of the cowboys, and it makes Jones mad, fighting mad.

He awakens from his sub-conscious existence, cleans out the saloon, and Tucker and Downs among them. They follow him to his ranch and knock him on the head. In this condition he is found by Rose and Wade.

From that moment he starts to change into a real live human being. His ranch, long neglected, and in violent disorder, begins to transform. Rose visits him to ask him if he won't get the men in Trail City to attend the Sunday School.

He promises he will, and on Sunday morning he again enters the saloon, warns the citizenry that from now on one hour of Sunday morning has got to be given to God. They attend the services and while this is going on, Tucker and Downs burn down Jones' ranch, kidnap Rose, and with most of Wade Harding's and Jones' stock they flee toward the border.

Jones takes up the trail. He proves by the way he outwits the thieves, recovers Rose and his stock that he is no longer "Too Tired Jones" and after his changing into a real live human being, Rose accepts him as her husband.
