Prudence Cole,A Quakeress, has been bought up by two conservative aunts, Elizabeth and Cynthia Whitney, in quiet Pottstown. They have molded her into a demure, modest,unsophisticated girl . The girl is not unhappy for "ignorance is bliss" and she is not aware anything is lacking in her sheltered life.

One day at tea there comes into her life a new aspration and vision. Henry Garrison and his mother, formerly neighbors and friends of her family, visit the Whitneys. Prudence is thrilled. She remembers that when she and Henry were small children they had vowed to be married when they grew up. Henry, a snob and a flirt, trifles with Prudence's affections and secretly despises her in her Quaker garb.

Mrs. Garrison invites Prudence for a visit to Haven, a fashionable seaside resort. Prudence arrives with Jane, her sombre dress making a sharp contrast with the fine gowns of the other women guests. Henry is ashamed of her appearance and neglects her for Amy Tillson. When Prudence appears at the swimming pool in a ridiculously old-fashioned bathing suit everyone laughs at her.

To amuse themselves the girls and boys appoint Prudence to ask Cheyne Rovein, a stand-offish artist, to stage a charade performance at the hotel. To their surprise Rovein consents and to their consternation the artist chooses Prudence for leading woman. Prudence makes a stunning appearance in the magnificent charades and Henry decides that she is well worth proposing to after all.

Prudence has now learned that Henry is shallow and refuses him. Rovein, who had known of her romance with Henry is delighted for he himself loves Prudence and he proposes and is accepted.
