Synopsis

George and Bee are lovers, Father is opposed to George as suitor, and George has worn the front steps of Dad's house down at the edges by his hurried exits from the Home.
At last the two lovers are in despair - they will elope and end the eternal quarrel. Bee sneaks out in her motor and calls for George and they make a get-away.
On a country road near a deserted house known or thought to be haunted they get a puncture. A storm is coming up and the lovers decide to see shelter in the house.
A gang of moonshiners that operate there under the name of the Coo-Coos by the aid of their costumes of hoods and mysterious noises try to make the life of George and Bee miserable.
Bee's father gives chase to the lovers and he arrives at the deserted house. Meanwhile the Sheriff and his deputies who have long suspected the house to be the headquarters of crooks get a line on the place and decide to raid it.
By the aid of George and Bee and also the help of Aaron, George's body servant, the Sheriff and his men at last succeed in rounding up the gang. Dad then sees that his son-in-law is more of a man than he thought he was and gives his blessing to the young people.
