THE TOONERVILLE TANGLE

The Skipper of Toonerville receives a letter from his nephew and as usual reads the town his own version of it. He informs them that his nephew is a very rich young man and when the nephew arrives in Toonerville they all recognize him as merely a pauper and no one will have anything to do with him, excepting the skipper and the daughter of the Town's Bank President.

Between the nephew and the daughter it is a case of love at first sight and the cashier of her father's bank is very jealous of the attentions his employer's daughter showers on this good for nothing. He contrives a plan to take money from the bank and hide it in the old oak where the nephew is to meet the banker's daughter that day, figuring that as soon as the nephew gets there he will call the police and have him arrested for robbery.

When the cashier puts the money in the tree there is an old tramp who sees him and after the cashier has departed this tramp takes the money.

When the nephew arrives at the tree the cashier is there with the police and although they cannot find the money the cashier insists that the nephew stole it and the nephew is dragged off to jail.

Comes the day for trial and here a mysterious gentleman enters who later proves to be the president of the federation of banks of which the Toonerville bank is a member and he shows that the nephew who is to be tried is really the general manager of that organization. Then the tramp enters and tells all he knows which results in the placing of the cashier behind the bars.

Later the nephew tells his sweetheart that the only reason he did not tell the town who he really was, was that he wanted to find out who his friends were.
