Alexander Holder, a private banker, was given as security a coronet of great val set with thirty nine beryls. He brought it home and after showing it t is son Arthur and niece Mary, locked it in an old bureau. Later in the e ning Arthur asked his father for an advance on his allowance, which was re used. Two o'clock in the morning the banker was awakened by a noise, and was horrified to find his son standing beside the bureau ho ding in his hands the coronet which was twisted out of shape, and one corner which conta d three beryls missing. He sent for the police and gave his son in charge, and next day went to Sherlock Holmes. The detective was not convinced of t young man's guilt and working on a few clues, discovered that Sir George Burnwe had come to the house to see Mary who had innocently told him about the cor net and he had persuaded her to steal it. Arthur, worrying over his financial condition, was unable to sleep, and heard Mary go down stairs. He saw her ta the coronet and give it to Burnwell. He gave chase, and in the fight that ensued the coronet had been damaged and Burnwell escaped with the broken off c rner. Arthur took the blame rather than let Mary suffer. Holmes went to Burnwell and discovered that he had already sold the beryls which Holmes repurchased.
