©CIM 2077 The fable tells the story of the farmer who prides himself on the size of the watermelons which he raises for market. He has plenty of difficulties keeping his products intact and from the ravages of a number of darkies who are tempted by their favorite fruit. The big event, the county fair, finally rolls around and the farmer has carefully nursed the pride of his watermelon crop, assured that it will take the first prize among fruits of its kind. He straps it upon the donkey's back and starts out for the fair. On the way all of the animals of Fableland, admire the magnitude of the melon, crying "How Beautiful! It will surely take the prize!" The donkey, being a conceited creature mistakes the praise for himself and bows low to the admirers of the melon. All along the road the words of praise are continually showered on the melon, and the donkey, finally overcome with the words which he believes are for himself, bows so low that the melon topples off his back and smashes to pieces.
