PUNCTUALITY

I leave the dinner dishes
And the kitchen is a mess.
The master has his coat on,
But I've just begun to dress.
I hear him race the motor,
Though my polish isn't dry;
And, of course, I tear a nylon
As the precious minutes fly.

Once in the car, I fumble
At the pin curls in my hair.
My comb is in another bag;
My earrings aren't a pair.
We're breathless as we enter
Precisely on the hour.
(Our hostess has no lipstick on,
Our host is in the shower!)

Silhouettes—Interesting Outdoors or In

Silhouettes are pictures that are fun to take once in a while—whether you do them indoors or out. They aren't anything one would substitute for the usual snapshots of favorite people, but they are a nice change of pace—the variety that adds spice to our pictures.

The principle is a simple one indeed. It's merely a matter of placing the subject squarely between the light and the camera.

Obviously, this isn't going to work outdoors on a bright sunny day. It would simply give you a back-lighted picture. So, for outdoor silhouettes, it is a matter of getting up early or doing your picture taking late in the day. The sun should be low in either the east or west to produce the desired effect.

Indoors, a white sheet, a darkened room, your subject posed in profile, and a short time exposure

—these are what you'll need for "Operation Silhouette." If you're shooting indoors in the daytime, stretch the sheet over a window so that the sunlight shining through will provide a luminous white background. Note that this will put the light behind the subject and in front of your camera—contrary to the usual rule of having the light fall on the subject from behind you as you snap the picture.

With your background all set up and your subject in profile against it, next darken the rest of the room and prepare to make a short time exposure. As with almost all picture taking, here's a case of "no jogs allowed"—for camera movement would really be fatal to the final results. This means, of course, that you'll have to place your camera on a tripod or some other firm support to hold it steady during exposure.

Capsule Quotes

A convention of Republican Women heard these words Tuesday by President Eisenhower: "If a political party does not have its foundation in determination to advance a cause that is right, then it is not a political party, it is merely a conspiracy to seize power."

The Bi-Racial Southern Regional Council in a letter to state chamber of commerce presidents in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, and Virginia, wrote: "Reasonable men and women in the South are disturbed by the extremist views which now dominate the public life of our region. Yet these people of good will are all but voiceless and powerless in the emotional climate which prevails. Unless this trend is reversed, the South faces the prospect of grave economic and cultural damage."

"The eyes of the world are upon the United States," warned Bishop Hamlett, at the Winter Council of Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, adding "and its actions of unfairness toward Negro citizens and others who have recently taken up citizenship in America. We do well to treat everybody in a fair and impartial way, for we'll need all elements of our citizenship in event we have to be forced into a world conflict. My observations in my recent world tour leads me to believe that the people of the world look upon the Negro visitors 'at some distance' when we advocate the fairness of the United States attitude toward Negroes."

18,000 delegates to the American Association of School Administration heard a committee on resolutions, in urging fair play and good will in controversial school desegregation issues: "It is the conviction of the association that all problems of integration of our schools are capable of solution at the state and local levels by citizens of intelligence, understanding and reasonableness working together in the interest of national unity for the common good of all. In this process, majorities and minorities have both responsibility and opportunity."
