THE ARIZONA CATACOMBS.

Discovery and Exploration of a Wonderful Cave.

Among some of the wonders of this "Wonderland of America," Arizona, which has made it famous, and served to surround this isolated region with a halo of mysticism and romance, a description of the recent discoveries of its catacombs by an exploring party will be read with interest.

The discovery was made about one mile east of Mountain Springs station in the southeastern part of the territory. The cave was found to have an arched entrance, about three feet wide and four feet high. Two of the explorers took the lead with candles placed in a small board and this fastened to a long pole, which was carried so that the light was cast far ahead of them, and danger from pits or other obstacles thus avoided.

After proceeding about one hundred feet down an incline they came to the two main branches of the cave. Taking the one to the right and leaving candles at various points by which to find their way back, there being innumerable chambers branching out in all directions, they continued their way through a chamber the walls of which, though presenting the appearance of stalactite formation, were black and dingy, which was accounted for by the finding of ashes and other indications of fire, evidently very old. Here no doubt was one of the haunts and resting places of the Apaches. Bones of all kinds of animals lay scattered around, no less than two hundred deer antlers being seen, and other evidences of life destruction and feasting. Animals may have done the work but if so they must pass to such a distance.

Into this cavern they groped their way, down, down, right and left for a distance of 500 feet and yet they found no end. In some places the cave was so small they would have to come down on "all fours" and creep through, and then suddenly would find themselves in a large room, full of gloomy grandeur, still as death and as full of mystery. Their candles giving out at a point about 500 feet from the entrance, they returned to
