Modern Scheherazades—The Circus—Life in the Market-Place.

(Special Correspondence of the Journal and Courier.)

City of Morocco, Oct. 19, 1901.

Characteristic of this land of yesterday is the professional story-teller and his deeply interested audience, to be frequently met in the streets, especially in the vicinity of the market-place toward the close of an afternoon.

Like public performers everywhere, the modern story-teller has assistants and summoners to his entertainments. Instead of advance agents, supes, bill-stickers, etc., the story performer goes about with only a slim chorus. Music there must be, because each pause in the narrative, however slight, is marked by two or three beats on the tightly stretched string of some queer instrument, or twangs with a palmetto plectrum.

First, the story-teller selects some comparatively slender topic, like the thoroughfare, and calls attention to himself, by yelling, over and over, at the top of his lungs, some such announcement as this: "In the name of the Prophet! Blessed be Allah!"

When a crowd has gathered the corners squatting in a circle, the latter one standing behind the first takes up a collection, and if the amount of money donated does not come up to his expectations, refuses to tell a word until more is contributed.

have convulsed the empire. Certainly it is the most interesting place to strangers. Bales of strange merchandise are being moved, camels are unloaded and donkeys loaded, green-turbaned merchants make rounds of inspection, men on horseback, in voluminous white robes, with yellow slippers gangling straight down on each side of the Hummy saddle, pick their way hither and thither through the crowd.

Barbers ply their trade in the open air, growing rich on market-days upon "country cuttings." Their office is of double nature, for, as in the old days, they bleed as well as shave. They use no lather, only water; and the customer sits on the ground, in front, while with razor, more or less keen, the barber removes his hair, the head, oftener than the beard, being shorn. In bleeding they make an incision at the base of the skull, cutting to the bone.
