

A Snake's Revenge

In the land of "The Morning Calm" there once lived one whose name was Pak Tong-bo, a great lover of nature and a great hunter.

Through this beautiful valley flowed a stream eddying round many rocks, tumbling over great boulders that reared their heads and making beautiful little miniature water-falls.

From twig to twig of these trees fluttered the little birds who caused the valley to reverberate with their happy songs.

After his morning repast, he would bathe himself with his precious volumes of the Chinese Classics in the borders of the tumbling stream and sitting on some rock, shaded by some ancient oak or luxuriant chestnut, there, pore over the precepts of the great Confucius.

One day when as he was thus engaged in study, he heard, above the murmur of the water a cry down the valley, and glancing along discovered a little bird helplessly fluttering.

Alas! it was uttering from some bewitchment or enchantment. What could it be? Pak became so interested that he raised himself by means of his stick and crept cautiously forward to see what ailed the bird.

Approaching with wily steps he discovered the bird was being charmed by a snake. Hurrying forward in his one desire to save the bird, he struck the reptile a heavy blow.

Some weeks later Pak went out hunting with falcon and snipe-bush into the forest of the other side of the mountain, and was greatly surprised to find there a newly erected house, above whose ridge-pole hung a sign announcing that a snake had been slain within.

Feeling much wearied with his tramp, he went in and ordered a cup of wine which was set before him, but as he raised the cup to his lips the girl addressed him, and he noticed as she spoke that she had a cloven tongue.

While the sports of summer are still taking up columns of space the first faint whispers are arising of that lord-of-all the fun of autumn, the game that draws a more truly enthusiastic crowd of fans than any other.

The football season, as far as this part of the country is concerned, means that part of the year in which those ancient foes, Yale, Harvard, Princeton, Pennsylvania and Cornell, assume prominent roles.

It has been found best to limit the days of play to Saturdays, and therefore the mid-week games which formerly were a regular part of the schedule have been largely eliminated.

There is more than condition gaining, though, in the wish of the coaches to start practice as soon as may be.

Rule changes made this year, while not radical, have brought a need for close study of the more open game and then, too, the season of 1912 did not give the teams enough time to master the distinctly different game which the rules of that date called for.

put down the cup and rushed forth. Instantly the girl changing herself into a reptile gave chase. He hurried on, but glancing back he perceived she was gaining steadily upon him.

Somewhere later Pak was as usual out in his beloved valley studying. Even as he studied there grew up beside him a little bush, but as absorbed in his study he did not notice it, and at last, weary with study, he slept.

In the morning he felt he was dying, and as a last request he begged his wife to carry him out to his favorite spot beneath one of the big oak trees in the valley.

These distressing thoughts were disturbed by the beating of a thousand tiny numbers of little fishes flew all around him, then they settled upon him and began pecking his flesh.

The birds kept on pecking here and there over the surface of his body and as he lay there he heard a voice that came creeping to make holes scores of little snakes.

So Pak once more recovered and remembered how true was the saying of that friend in need is a friend indeed.

The fans of those days, who therefore refused to recognize the championship claims of either Meggs or "the Nailer."

M'GOORTY WILL BE FIT WHEN BELL RINGS

(By T. S. Andrews.) Eddie McGoorty, the Wisconsin middle weight, who did not fight up to his standard the past few months of his campaign last spring, has decided to get down to business now and prepare for a busy time this fall.

Eddie has had a good rest among the northern pines and is now ready to get into harness. He is still working with Rudy Unholz and they are endeavoring to get a match with Jack Dillon at Denver for Labor day, but that will likely fall through.

McGoorty realizes now that he must get back into the first rank, otherwise he will not be the money maker he was last year when he started the season. There is no reason why he should not be at the top of the list, for he has everything that goes to make a great middleweight—size, height, strength, cleverness and hitting power.
