

THE HOUSEHOLD.

STONE'S LOVE AFFAIR.

A CHARMING STORY.

It was agreed on all hands that Ned Stone was very practical fellow. He was a broker in his city. He had been very poor at one time in his life, and had had to work very hard. His industry had in the end, however, met its reward.

"I was so astonished that before I think, he knew quite what he was doing, he'd taken my head, with all his friends standing around and looking on. Of course, he could not go back after that. And—no—the thing was settled."

"I congratulated him heartily. Presently I said by chance: "How lucky it was that you didn't send Miss Warren's letters!"

"You found them too dear to you?" "At that time, he had been betrayed into a feeling of romance. "Not at all," he exclaimed. "I couldn't send them back, because I hadn't kept them, I'd destroyed them."

"What was the good of them? I only keep business letters; they're regularly docketed at my office. But for George's letters, they were no use to me, I was taking care of them. I made them into pipe lights."

"You didn't tell her that?" "No, I hadn't time. I never arrived at my explanation about the letters."

"What, my dear Stone, let me entreat you, whatever the reason, that you didn't send Miss Warren's explanation about the letters."

"No, I shouldn't!" "Why shouldn't I?" "Do you think so?" he asked musingly. "But if George has made any mistake about the matter, I think that I am bound to set her right."

"Whether or not I took my advice, I'm not aware. He was married in due course to Miss Warren; and I know that the lady was often heard to declare subsequently that she married the best husband in the world."
