of their houses or their lands; and from the day Kirby Smith surrendered his army to this hour, no person from the Rebel States has ever asked a favor from me or from any other person, and I have not freely given it; and I mean to give both act and thought, and everything I have in the future, to elevate, improve and build up that blasted section of country; and, Sir, believe that what I say is not merely a boast on my part, but a promise from the Free States. I repeat, we would build and erect a church, erect a school-house, send capital, send aid, everything in our power, to build up the war-worn, war-wasted places of the Rebel States. Mr. Wilson next adverted to the objects of the President's Senate and during the recess thereof, he appointed and commissioned by the President to hold the office of Postmaster-General, and he thought that it was not used by any officer of the Government in paying salary or compensation to such person.

The President thanked the delegates sincerely for the compliment which they had paid him by their visit.
