THE ASTOR LIBRARY. It is not until the day of the death, which occurred yesterday, that the Astor library, which was founded by John Jacob Astor, is considered as a thing of the past. It is a family principle to stun all such notoriety; and the head of the house who had just died had trained his dependents so well to this habit, that even his son of business and the day of his death, to give the reporters the slightest information regarding him. They would not even say where he was born, or indulge in the slightest reminiscence of his early business career.
