Our Jack-Tars
On the High Seas

When it's mealtime in the navy the jack tars seat themselves at tables of this sort, with everything all set and ready for them. Photo shows mess tables and messmen in casemates on the U. S. S. North Dakota.

Crew at work in a corner of the big galley of the U. S. S. North Dakota. This photo gives some idea of the amount of soup required to satisfy the "inner man" of a ship's crew.

The galley on board the U. S. S. North Dakota. Here you see Thanksgiving turkeys all ready to be heaped on the plates and served to the sailor boys.

Does a Jackie love pie? Foolish question! And he gets lots of it, too. Here is shown the bakery on a modern battleship, with the crew at work making pies—pies—and still more pies.

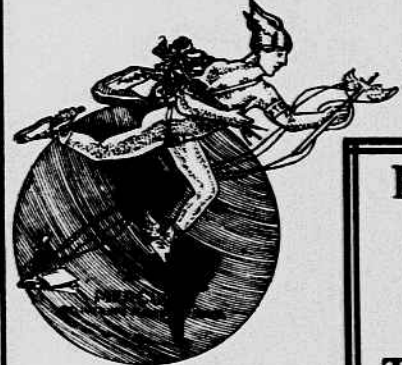

In the old days Jackie sat himself down with a sharp knife and peeled "spuds," but today potato-peeling machines of this sort do the work.

Bread for the Jackies is not kneaded by hand, but in machines. The one shown here has finished its work and is emptying the dough into a large receptacle.

On every battleship there is a butcher shop—known as such—and here is a photo of one of them, showing a member of the butcher shop crew at work.
