INCIDENTS OF THE MASSACRE

Execution of a Woman in the Streets — Many Bloody Chapters in the Reign of Terror.

[By the Editor.]

To me the revolution of 1793 in France, with its terrible outbreaks of anger, ferocity, constitution-making, bloodshed, ravings about liberty, despotism of the democracy—the entire Reign of Terror—had always been the most fascinating chapter in all history. When, therefore, I happened to be in London in May, 1871, at the time when a fierce war existed between the National Government of France and the Commune, directly after the Franco-German War, when Paris was barricaded and was under the fire of the National guns, I had an intense desire to visit that city—if I could do so safely. It was believed in London that the National troops would not be able to enter the city for some weeks, and until they did, life in the city itself was in no danger excepting on the Versailles side of it, where the fighting was continuous.

On the 19th of May, 1871, W. C. Dwyer, of the firm of Bowles Brothers & Co., American bankers in Paris and London, told me that he should leave on the evening train for Paris, and in order to pass without arrest through the military lines which the Commune had established around Paris, had secured from the American Minister in London the office of bearer of dispatches to Minister Washburn in Paris. At his suggestion I called on the American Minister at once, and he made me also a bearer of dispatches to Mr. Washburn. We, the joint bearers, left by the evening train for Paris, via Calais, and reached the railway station in Paris early in the morning. The northern part of France was still occupied by sections of the German army in order to keep the peace and until the National Government had taken possession of the city.

A company of Communists, without uniforms, occupied the railway station, and the officer in command, after carefully examining our papers, permitted us to enter.

On entering a fauce we drove through the streets. The stores were closed. The quiet of a New England Sunday prevailed. As we approached a barricade constructed of carts and stones, we stopped, and the officer in command examined our papers. He read them with difficulty, and did not appear to understand them. Dwyer told him that we were Americans on our way with dispatches to the American Minister. He replied: "The American Minister is our friend. Go on, gentlemen." On reaching the Hotel Chatham, I engaged my room and found myself about the only guest in the house. Dwyer left with the dispatches and also left word at the rooms of Edward King that I had arrived. King was the correspondent of the Boston Journal, and had been a correspondent in the Carlist revolution in Spain, in the war in Bulgaria, and in the Franco-German war. He remained in Paris during the siege, and kept to his post during the Commune trouble. He spoke the French language with ease, and his large figure, blond face and tactful manner enabled him to move among the Communist troops on duty. I had known him for some years. We strolled along the Boulevard des Italiens and settled down in the Cafe de la Paix for breakfast. Every store was closed. The streets were deserted. We alone occupied the large room of the cafe. But the street-sweepers were at work as usual, as if the Empire was at peace. The waiter brought to us coffee and remarked, "We are doing no business now." In a few moments a regiment of Communists, covered with mud and dirt, marched by. They had served in the front and were retiring for a rest. We then proceeded to military headquarters for a pass. King said: "I must give you a standing character. I will call you an American educator." He made a speech to the officer in charge, complimented the officers on their fidelity to duty, and got me a pass, under the signature of the commanding general. As we passed out into the street, King said: "Listen to the musketry fire in the trenches at Issy." Then we heard the report of cannon. We hired a hack, but the driver stipulated that we should not ask him to get under fire. At the Trocadero, from which there was an excellent view of the entrenchments, we saw the smoke and heard the reports of the muskets along a line of ten miles. Many thousand well-dressed Frenchmen with their wives stood near us and without any excitement watched the distant contest. On reaching the Arc de Triomphe, the driver said "We shall be under fire in this place." So we left him protected behind a house and walked to the Arc. Soon a policeman said: "The firing from Mont Valerien will begin before long and they will send shells to this place. You must retire."

In the afternoon we visited the spot where the guillotine stood in '93, on the Place de la Concorde, and found a barricade. An officer without uniform examined our passes, but seemed to be unable to read them. King made another clever speech, and we climbed over the barricade. Then we visited the Corps Legislatif, which was converted into a workshop, in which 1,500 women were sewing sacks into which sand was to be placed for earthworks. A fine-looking, tall girl, with a red

BRILLIANT ENDORSEMENT.
By Health Journal of New York August 24, 1899.—J. A. Davis, M.D., Editor and Manager.

Only last week we examined the beer brewed by the Capital Brewing Company of Olympia, Wash., and it is a perfect illustration of the quality of beer which we are always glad to commend, for the analysis showed it to be entirely free from any trace of any injurious substance. Such a high grade of beer is most beneficial in its use, for none of the pure malt and hops have been displaced by harmful ingredients. Every hygienist will concur with us in saying that a beer of such superior excellence is a very wholesome beverage. Physicians often have occasion to prescribe a pure beer for cases of debilitation, and they can safely order this beer, made by the Capital Brewing Company.

L. H. Dee has in his keeping the American Journal of Health and can be seen by anyone.

This beer can be had in bottle or on draught at the HOFFMAN, corner of Hotel and Nuuanu streets. A large assortment of the very best of American and foreign liquors we are pleased to sell you and give you value for the benefit of your health.
