

THE GAMBLERS

Charles Klein's New Play May Teach a Moral of Wall Street to the Men, but to Every Woman in the Audience It Spells a Lesson of Married Life

Like most of his productions, Charles Klein's latest play, "The Gamblers," deals with the problems of the day from the masculine point of view. As "The Third Degree" was intended to show the evils of the police system, so "The Gamblers" is a bit at the political reformer and the Wall street crowd, but the women who go to see the play will tell you differently. They see in it an expose of married life, one of the reasons why the divorce evil is growing and why homes are being broken up every day. And they're right.

Two men hold central positions in the play—Darwin, the righteous district attorney, and Wilbur Emerson, head of a banking system which impels the money of its depositors by illegal loans and investments. There isn't a woman living whose sympathy wouldn't go out to the first man, for women, take them as a class, detest dishonesty in speculation above all things. They have suffered too much by it. But by the end of the play not a feminine member of the audience has a particle of sympathy for the virtuous district attorney who convicts the Wall street thieves.

And why? I ask you. Because it turns out that he prosecutes and muck-rakes for his own political advancement? Not a bit of it! That wouldn't worry the average woman.

Because of the way he treats his wife.

Selfishness incarnate crops out all over him, while the other man, lacking in every virtue, at least thinks of others before himself, and that settles it with the average woman.

You men who complain that you are losing your wives' affection, go to see "The Gamblers" and ask yourself: "Am I self centered like this man? Am I like a Pharisee? Do I pride myself upon my goodness, my honesty, my honor to the exclusion of every other human feeling?" Darwin never for one moment concedes that there may be another point of view equally right with his own. His requests to his wife are really commands. She is well provided for, but provided for as he dictates; her friends, her occupations, must be of his choosing; his interests must be hers, no matter what old time associations and friendships hold her back.

He feels she is married to a good, to an upright, man, and, puffed up in his self conceit, he tries to improve her by bringing her up to his level, to make another self out of her.

When not engaged in educating her up to his standards or in bullying her to do his will he leaves her alone. She can read or she can yawn or she can reflect on his greatness. The fact that he is working to advance himself in the world ought to be enough to keep her heart warm, to keep her contented as she sits hour after hour alone in the evening listening to the ticking of the clock.

How many "good" men there are like Darwin. No wonder women leave them for the bad ones.

Add the women in the audience do some tall thinking. After all, the word "good" is a relative term—at least it seems so to some wives.

A New Ostrich Set

Ostrich and chiffon is this charming set. The ostrich trimming is in a taupe shade. The chiffon is on the same tone, only lighter. Following the newest style, one side of the muff is trimmed deeper than the other. Deep pink ribbon roses add to the smart effect.

They were shown by the magistrate that gambling was not the only way in which they and their money could be separated.

Three ordinary booze-fighters donated $14, which is the equivalent of 140 beers.

BISHOP NICHOLS MAY COME AGAIN

Bishop William Ford Nichols of the diocese of California will probably be a visitor here next year for the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Episcopal Church in the islands. Bishop Nichols came here ten years ago when the church in the islands was transferred from Anglican to American authority. He passed through again yesterday, a passenger on the Tenyo Maru, returning from Europe via the Orient.

A special committee of Episcopal churchmen waited on him here and invited him to come down next year. He declared he would do so if possible and intimated that he might be able to do so. The committee was composed of James Wakefield, L. Tenney Peck and Robert Catton, and was indorsed in its efforts by the church organizations generally.

AUTOISTS ARE ANGRY ABOUT IT

Some of the autoists who were nabbed for speeding by Motorcycle Officer Chilton are very angry. In each case, it is claimed, they were going just a fraction over twenty miles an hour and two of them couldn't go much faster if they tried.

They think they have a legitimate kick because they were nulled on a quiet street in daylight, whereas the city is full of speeders after night who are never apprehended.

"If the police would pay more attention to the drunken chauffeurs who speed around the business streets at night, knocking down people and get scot-free, instead of catching business men who are on little speed streets and going just over the limit, their efforts would be of more real value," was the declaration of one of the victims of Chilton's watch this morning.

POLICE NOTES.

The three Portuguese disturbers of peace from the Punahou district had their cases set aside for one week.

For Linoleum Go To Coyne's

Y. Akona, who went home last night and found his spouse courting Bacucus, proceeded to use her for a punching-bag. The female bacucarian hid herself to the police station and applied for a warrant for the arrest of her pugilistic mate. She regretted, during her sober moments, her hasty action, and pleaded with the court to suspend his sentence. Thirteen months were granted for an improvement in the Celestial's behavior.

Maria Dolgy and Afanas Baranoff, two natives of Russia, contributed the sum of ten and thirty kopeks, respectively, with five and thirty court trimmings, for violation of the social laws.

Gordon Pecke, passer of bogus checks, at the request of his attorney, J. A. Magoon, had his case go over to next Thursday.
