PASTOR SPEAKS ON VALUE OF MAN

Rev. John L. Imhof of Christian Church Delivers Sermon on Timely Topic.

"War and the Value of Man," was the topic discussed by Rev. John L. Imhof unday morning at the First Christian church. By way of introduction the speaker brought out the bad as well as the good effects of the war on our appreciation of the value of a human. In showing the importance of an individual, he said: "Family, school, church and nation all exist for the individual. In the war there has developed a better spirit of democracy in which the individual comes into greater freedom and more just treatment from his fellowmen."

The speaker mentioned three needs that many have at the present time. The first he spoke of as the need of mastering self as opposed to nervousness caused by the speeding up process that exists.

The power of friendship was treated on, and an appeal was made for a broader and more sympathetic understanding of the lives of others. In dealing with this subject he said: "There is a demand for us to cultivate the moral imperative. The greatest thing in the world is duty. Nothing gives more satisfaction than for one to play his part well in the affairs of everyday life. The individual must be taught to be unselfish, as the life one lives is more significant than the work one does, so character is above service."

The Smith family reunion was held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Smith of E. Tenth st., Sunday. A musical program was enjoyed by those present. A family dinner was served by the hostess.

CLUSTER LIGHTS WILL BE REDUCED

Board of Public Works Ignores Petition From Business Men.

At a meeting of the board of public works Monday morning a petition signed by nearly every business man in the city, asking the board to keep the present cluster system of lighting in the downtown districts, and not to substitute the single fixture, was turned down cold. The members of the board seemed to feel that it was an imposition that any one should put in a kick upon any thing they contemplated doing, and dismissed the matter with few words.

The single lighting post is in use by many of the larger cities and is more economical in the amount of current it takes and in the upkeep of globes. The city has purchased a sample fixture and has attached it to a corner post on N. Church and First sts. The installing of the new system will be done by the regular city electrical force.

It has been suggested by several prominent business men that if the city administration is so desirous of saving money that it cut out the two outside globes on the present system and burn only the top one until after the war.

A petition presented by the Dodge Mfg. Co., requesting that the crossing on Beiger and Burket sts., and at the New York Central lines, be fixed up as they were in bad shape, was granted.

A protest by the same company against building a sidewalk along their factory on S. Union st., as was ordered a year ago was refused. The permit for the walk was taken out some time ago but the work was not started. Supt. of Water and Electric Lights Kline was commissioned to buy 100 electric meters before the price goes up.

Buccaneering for Betty

By A. M. Crawford

If the dusky porter on the Boston Express had been a matchmaker that day in midsummer he would have selected the orange blossoms for the two young people who sat opposite each other in the Pullman sleeper, improperly named Coquette. Improperly, because the girl, Betty Somers, distinctly discouraged any intercourse, and held her eyes disdainfully aloof from the ardent glances of her admirer. From all appearances, they might have been total strangers; but Jack Hardy remembered what the girl seemed determined to forget—that she had all but promised to "love, honor and obey" him at one time.

It was by accident that they had both boarded the express at Bath—it was fate which had placed them in the same car and in opposite seats—so Hardy thought. Instead of assisting fate, Betty, foolishly proud, tossed her little head, and refused him recognition in her decision to continue the old quarrel. She was the same passionate, piquant Betty, with the soft puffs of bronze hair framing her fresh cheeks, which bore the gypsy tan of an evident sojourn at the shore.

So she was still angry; that, at least was better than indifference, Hardy reflected. How vexed she had been on the memorable day of their disagreement. How trivial had been the cause, a mere expression of disapproval on his part of her allegiance to the suffrage movement. He flushed with the remembrance of her addressing the street throng in Union Square, from the yellow draped tonneau of a touring car. With her eager face, the soft cadences of her rich voice, she had attracted crowds, if not converts. It maddened Hardy then; now he understood and forgave, as he watched Betty with her war knitting. She had required some outlet for her flaming youth. It was suffrage then. Red Cross now. An electric fan droned monotonously, breaking the stillness of the car, without affecting the mercury. Hardy turned the pages of Hollier's Weekly idly; it only aggravated without amusing him. Girls and happy families everywhere. They pursued him in magazine advertisements, and on the billboards outside breakfast foods, victrolas, rugs and motor cars flaunted their pictures of domestic bliss. If only something, or somebody, would turn up to break the ice of Betty's hostility. But, lacking the faith of Micawber, and unable to bear her haughty glances longer, Hardy rose to seek consolation in a smoke.

The girl regarded his retreating figure somewhat wistfully, then pulled down the shade with a defiant jerk, shutting out the hot sun, and the drearily uninteresting scenery of inland Maine. Finally her knitting dropped, and she had half closed her eyes in drowsy reminiscence when conversation in the seat behind and the mention of Hardy's name brought her suddenly to attention.

"He'll be coming back soon," a man's voice said.

"You're sure he has the papers?" another asked.

"Positive. We'll get them at any cost. Persuade him off the train at Denby Junction—there's a stop for water."

"Telegraph Thompson?"

"Sure. He'll be there with the machine. Once get Hardy in it——"

"There he comes now," the second voice interrupted.

Instinctively, without reckoning, Betty had risen to her feet, and now approached Hardy. She couldn't deny him friendship at a time like this, and he must be told at any cost.

Hardy greeted her joyfully, and listened in some amazement to her well-timed warning, repeated in the seclusion of the observation platform. "Their little game's off now," he exclaimed in appreciation, "thanks to you! You see," in explanation, "I'm chief witness for the prosecution in an important forgery trial which comes off in Boston. I've got the papers which will ruin the defense." They soon left the intricate subject of trials for more interesting topics. There was a two years' gap in their acquaintance to be accounted for. No, she was not married, nor even engaged. She had given up suffrage electioneering; the war had dwarfed such things to insignificance. And so on.

It was dark when they had finished dinner together and the train drew up at Denby Junction. Hardy suggested a walk on the station platform for a breath of air during the ten-minute wait. Betty hesitated a moment, then assented laughingly—"just to tantalize the plunderers," she said. Nevertheless, she leaned imperceptibly toward Hardy's protecting figure as they descended into the feebly illuminated darkness of Denby Junction.

The station was quite deserted, there was no waiting motor, no visible Thompson. "They didn't look like buccaneers, Jack," Betty looked about dubiously, while Hardy winced.

"Don't be angry, dear," he began, "I've a confession to make. Had to create a thaw somehow, and there was no chance for me unless you made the first advances. So we, that is, Cacey, Winthrop and myself, staged the highway robbery act. They're homeward bound from a fishing trip, and keen to meet you. The stakes were laid on your concern for my safety—a long chance, I admit."

Betty drew the arm he had appropriated away, in mixed bewilderment and scorn. "And there was no trial after all? Now, I shan't ever speak to you again!"

"Very well, don't speak, but listen! You forced me to it. I've enlisted, Betty, just say you"——

"In that case you won't need me," she parried.

Nothing daunted, Hardy answered, "If you won't be a necessity, you must be a luxury—there's a tax on luxuries, I believe."

The platform was empty, save for them; a sudden breeze from the nearby meadows whipped curls of bronze across Betty's cheek. Quickly the man's arms were about her, holding her, and Betty did not resist while the tax on luxuries was collected.
