WOMEN MAKE THANKS FOR ARMY.

British women are now making tanks for the army. In one factory every operation in the whole process of construction is carried on by women and in many others they are employed on various parts. They are also making good in many varieties of shipyard work and in blast furnaces, brick yards, and spelter works. A foreman in charge of a blast furnace is quoted as saying that he would be willing to undertake any form of ferroconcrete work with only women as his assistants.

ARRIVES OVERSEAS.

Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Goodall, 225 DuBall av., have received a cablegram announcing the arrival of their son, William P. Goodall in England. Pvt. Goodall is with the 48th aero squadron, formerly stationed at Hampton, Va.

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

By Adele Garrison

HOW HARRY'S "WHAT YOU ALL NEED IS SOMETHING TO STIR YOU UP" WAS ANSWERED. Grace Draper's condition rapidly grew worse after she had released me from my promise to stay with her until her death.

From the moment when Dr. Pettit uncovered the sham of the delirium she was affecting in order to make me believe Dicky was false to me, she sank rapidly into real unconsciousness, real delirium.

The night for her life was a bitter and prolonged one. Authorized by Dicky, Dr. Pettit secured a second nurse so that the girl was watched night and day by the best skill obtainable.

But I had no personal knowledge of the desperate struggle that was being waged for the girl's life. Back in Marvin, under Lillian's kindly ministrations, my nerves, well nigh shattered by the harrowing experiences I had gone through, were slowly being healed.

When we found that the fight for Grace Draper's life was to be a long and grim one, Lillian decided that it would be best for Dicky and me to return to the old Brennan house at Marvin. She also arranged that she and Harry should accompany us there, leaving her colored maid, Betty, to wait upon the two nurses and the sick girl.

"I'm not even asking if you want me," she said, with the lovable impetuosity that is so characteristic of her, "for I know you need me. You're not fit to stay by yourself. For you've been through too much. And besides, there'll be less chances for the neighbors to talk if we're all here as we were before."

How Defenses Were Built. The gossip of the Marvin neighbors was the thing we feared most. To prevent it we had taken every precaution. When I said "we" I mean Lillian. From the moment when she had sent for the Crest-haven taxi to come for us in the place of the lone machine from Marvin to the moment when she and I came back to the Marvin house chatting as if nothing had happened, her vigilance had never faltered.

It was she who had sent Katie back the next morning after the accident with instructions to open the house as if nothing had happened, and say to any one who inquired about us that Dicky and I and the Underwoods had gone for a short trip together.

From that day until the day Lillian and I returned, Katie had come out to Marvin from the city early each morning, stayed during the day to give the house a semblance of occupation, and returned to the city each evening, where she had slept at the home of her cousin, her only relative in the city.

Lillian had also persuaded Grace Draper's sister, Mrs. Gorman, to return to her home. It was not hard to induce the poor woman to do so, for she was almost useless in the sick room and was sorely needed in her own home. Lillian cautioned her to be sure to say that her sister, Miss Draper, had been called away to the home of the sick relative whom she had visited earlier in the summer.

Thus, with all our defenses fortified, we came back to Marvin. "You've Got Your Wish." Dicky's arm was completely healed and no one seeing him swinging homeward along the country road with Harry Underwood would have dreamed that between the time of his home coming and the hour when he last traversed that road toward the city lay a whole volume of terror and tragedy.

But all our pretense of gayety dropped from us when we were finally gathered within the friendly shelter of our home. All through the days which we spent together the shadow of the horror we had been through hovered over us.

Constantly before my eyes was the image of Grace Draper as I had last seen her, wounded, almost dying, yet summoning all the strength she had in one last attempt to poison my belief in Dicky. She had said that never would I be able to tell how much was false and how much true of her pretended ravings. Before she had said that I had felt my cup full to overflowing. But even in our most intimate moments since then the doubt she had planted in my mind would raise its head like a serpent and instill its venom into my happiness.

I struggled hard to keep Dicky from discovering my feelings. I had not told him of the girl's pretended delirium and the things she had said. I was not sure, however, that he did not know it. If Lillian thought he ought to know it she was perfectly capable of telling him, but I shrank from mentioning in any way the name of the girl who had wrought such evil to me and mine. Lillian and Harry tried their best to act as if nothing outward had happened, but it was a difficult task they set themselves.

Harry Underwood voiced the general feeling one night at dinner. "Of all the funerals I ever attended this is about the limit," he said, glancing around the little table, punctuating his remark by savage little slashes with his salad fork at the unoffending combination of romaine, tomato and cucumber before him. "I keep looking over my shoulder all the while, thinking the undertaker will say, 'pallbearers stand this way, please.' It's all right to be upset and grieved by the actions of our misguided feminine friend, but I don't see any sense in all this going into crapes for the rest of our lives over it."

"What you all need," he went on didactically, "is something to stir you up, make trouble, get you good and fighting mad."

Through the open windows we heard the rush of a taxicab turning swiftly from the road into the driveway near the dining room door. Then a voice, which we all knew, spoke in imperious dismissal of the driver.

"I think you've got your wish," said Lillian, making a little face at Harry.

The rest of us said nothing. For myself, I was too surprised, too dismayed to speak, for on the threshold, looking daggers at Harry and Lillian Underwood, whose presence in our home she had always forbidden, stood Dicky's mother.

MAXIMUM PRICE ON SHOES NOW $12. PRICES TO BE STAMPED INSIDE
WASHINGTON, Oct. 3.—A maximum price of $12 on shoes was set this afternoon by the war industries board, following a series of conferences with manufacturers and retail dealers. Manufacturers of shoes to retail in excess of $12 must cease on Oct. 15, and manufacturers are given until Jan. 1, to fill their present contracts for shoes of that grade. Retailers have until June 1, next, to get rid of their present stocks. Dealers violating the order will have their supplies cut off from the manufacturers and manufacturers who fail to live up to it will have their supply of raw materials cut off by the board.
