DO MOTHERS ERR?

When we hear of so many school girls and girls in stores and offices who are often totally unfit to perform their daily duties because of some derangement peculiar to their sex...

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

By Adele Garrison

WHAT HAPPENED AT THE DINER TABLE

"Do you like the mountains as well as you thought you would, Mrs. Graham?"

Mrs. Allis's low, clear voice floated across the supper table at the Cosgrove farmhouse...

"Much, much better, thank you," I replied, smiling at her. I was determined to put a little extra cordiality into my manner toward her...

"After all, my common sense told me there was no real reason why I should so dislike Mrs. Allis after an acquaintance of less than an hour..."

"She was sitting opposite me. Next to her on her left was the blue-eyed boy who had carried our luggage, while on the other side of her were two well set up young men..."

Joyful Mr. Cosgrove, with his kindly wife, sat at the head and foot of the table.

"Supper is the only meal I ever sit down to," Mrs. Cosgrove had explained as she bore in two huge plates heaped with smoking-hot biscuit.

Mr. Cosgrove passed a plate of delicious looking broiled ham to Dicky.

"Oh, we're so glad we have new people," said little Mrs. Allis, clapping her hands with an affection of pretty childlikeness.

"A Humorous Mystery. A tiny flush stole over Mrs. Cosgrove's face, and I caught the hint of a steely glimmer in her eyes as she looked toward the woman who had just thrown out the insinuation that the first meals of new boarders were better than the following ones."

"But her voice was cool and placid as ever as she spoke."

"We never have any hot dishes at supper," she explained to me quietly, "except warmed up potatoes and a dish of hot bread of some kind, but when people have traveled all day, as I assume you have, they are hungry, so I simply have hot meat for all tonight instead of cold."

"And I particularly dote on broiled ham," said little Mrs. Allis brightly, "especially Mrs. Cosgrove's. Her broiled ham is not food, it's a poem. That's the reason why I'm so glad you were hungry tonight."

The flush faded from Mrs. Cosgrove's face, but the hardness did not leave her eyes. I saw that Mrs. Allis's attempt at smoothing over things had not placated Mrs. Cosgrove.

I could not help but admire, however, the adroitness with which the younger woman had seen the effect of her cat-like thrust and the skill with which she had endeavored to change the meaning of her own words.

There was no more conversation for a little. We all did full justice to the ham and potatoes, the hot biscuit and honey, the real cream and butter, and the home-made peach preserves which heaped the table before us.

"There's Ned now!" commented Mrs. Cosgrove.

With a muttered "excuse me," the blue-eyed boy at Mrs. Allis's side got up from the table and hurried into the kitchen.

"Ned is my other son," Mrs. Cosgrove explained.

In another moment a boy, who, to my eyes, was the one who had just left the room, reappeared completely dressed in a khaki suit and called out cheerily:

"I've got two of them, and I'm starving."

I knew Dicky's face was as bewildered as mine. For Mr. and Mrs. Cosgrove, Mrs. Allis and even the two strange youths burst into laughter.

"It strikes everybody that way at first," Mr. Cosgrove replied. Then, raising his voice, he called:

"Come in here, Fred!"

The door opened, and the first boy we had seen appeared.

"Twins!" ejaculated Dicky.

"Is it a mystery?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Allis, "and such twins I don't believe you've ever seen! I've been here four weeks, and I'm never sure to which boy I'm speaking."

As the boys stood side by side, flushing partly with embarrassment and partly with enjoyment of the sensation their marvellous resemblance created, I mentally agreed with Mrs. Allis. But I had been trained to very close observation, and I made up my mind that while the boys stood there in such widely different garb I would try to see if there were not some tiny characteristic about one of them by which I could always distinguish him from the other.

I scrutinized them closely and finally found a distinguishing characteristic, one which I was sure the mother knew. As I sank back into my chair, Mr. Cosgrove said joyfully, but with an uneasy note:

"Think you can tell which is which after this?"

"I am very sure I can," I said quietly.

The mother of the boys was looking directly at me. At my words she leaned forward, with a quickly drawn breath. Into her eyes there flashed a tortured look—a look of fear.

Women's War Work

Patriotism demands that those vegetables which were grown in our summer war gardens should be properly stored now, so that real benefit may be derived from them during the winter.

The first of these on the proper storage of Irish potatoes follows and others will appear from time to time in this column.

Irish Potatoes. The Irish potato is our most important garden crop from a storage standpoint. The production of Irish potatoes in the United States is on an average of about four bushels for each person. Allowing for losses it is assumed that our average consumption is in the neighborhood of three or three and one-half bushels per capita each year.

Some families use a greater proportion of potatoes than others and this should be taken into consideration both in the matter of growing potatoes for storage and in determining the quantity that should be placed in storage.

A family of five will require all the way from 10 to 15 bushels to supply them during the winter and spring months.

Irish potatoes should be kept cool and a slight degree of moisture will do them no harm. They can be stored in barrels, boxes, crates, or bins. If barrels are used a few small holes should be cut or bored near the bottom to admit a little air.

For storage in outdoor pits, select a well-drained spot and remove a little of the surface soil from a circular area, and spread a little straw or other litter on the ground to place the potatoes upon.

Stack the potatoes in a conical pile and cover to a depth of about three inches with straw or corn fodder. Leaves are not desirable for this purpose as they pack a little too closely.

Cover the straw or fodder with about three inches of soil and insert a piece of drain pipe or a small wooden box about four inches square in the top of the pit to give air. This box or ventilator should extend down a few inches into the mound of potatoes and should have a top to keep out rain.

Later as the weather grows colder more soil should be added and if necessary an additional layer of straw put on and more soil spread over it to hold it in place.

The thickness of the covering needed will depend upon the location and the degree of temperature that must be guarded against. It should be borne in mind that Irish potatoes are ruined by freezing. In extremely cold climates the ventilator box in the top of the mound should be pulled out and the pit tightly closed when the final covering is put on.

NEWS OF INTEREST TO POLISH CITIZENS

BOXES, the contents of which were valued at $400, were shipped by the White Eagle White Cross auxiliary to the Polish comfort committee headquarters at New York.

The boxes contained: Ten knitted sweaters, 119 pairs knitted socks, four pairs knitted wristlets, three knitted scarfs, 123 hospital towels, 21 hospital pillow slips, 90 colored handkerchiefs, 17 ice bag covers, two hot water bottle bags, two undershirts for women, 12 undershirts for girls, two boys' blouses, 14 bandage foot socks, three knitted caps, one crocheted afghan, 40 hospital napkins.

The meeting of the Polish military committee, which was to have been held this evening at St. John Cantius library parlors, has been postponed until further notice.

TODAY'S BEAUTY HINT You can enjoy a delightful shampoo with very little effort and for a very trifling cost, if you get Canthrox and dissolve a teaspoonful in a cup of hot water. This makes a full cup of shampoo liquid—enough so it is easy to apply it to the hair instead of just the top of the head. Your shampoo is now ready. Just pour a little at a time on the scalp and hair until both are entirely covered by the daintily perfumed preparation that thoroughly dissolves and removes every bit of dandruff, excess oil and dirt. After rinsing, the hair dries quickly with a fluffiness that makes it seem heavier than it is, and takes on a rich luster and a softness that makes arranging it a pleasure.
