Indianapolis and other Indiana Cities and Towns Will End Two-Year Fight to Lower Phone Rates Before Public Service Commissioners.

The two-year fight of Indianapolis and sixty-three other Indiana cities to hold down the Indiana Bell Telephone Company's rates will begin Monday at a hearing before the public service commission. Special counsel employed by the companies will present arguments of evidence which it has been gathered will last three weeks.

The trial began in June, 1923, when the company asked the commission for new rates which would result in an increase of approximately $3.60 in a family's rates.

The company plans to prove that the new rates were not granted by the commission.
