PROGRESSIVES WIN—WILSON NOMINATED

Woodrow Wilson, governor of New Jersey, was nominated as Democratic candidate for president on the forty-sixth ballot this afternoon.

It was a great victory for William Jennings Bryan, a great victory for the progressives.

It was a great defeat for the bosses, for the Old Guard of the Democratic party, that had ruled so long.

It was a great defeat for William Randolph Hearst, who threw all his eggs in one basket—Champ Clark—and then found the basket had no bottom.

It was a great defeat for the Associated Press, which distorted the news of the convention, and this morning called Wilson's candidacy dead.

It was the ending of the most bitter, and one of the longest deadlocks that ever tied up an American national convention.

When the convention was called to order one week ago today, Boss Murphy came out with this:

"New York will never, never, never vote for Woodrow Wilson."

It was known why Murphy did this. The Ryans and the Belmonts had given out they would not contribute to Wilson's campaign fund.

Foss received 27 votes on 43d, 44th and 45th ballots.

Wall street did not want Wilson. Wall street was afraid of Wilson.

Then William Jennings Bryan went to the mat with Wall street over the temporary chairmanship.

He was defeated, and nearly every newspaper in the country promptly and joyfully "eliminated" him.

But Bryan wasn't eliminated. He came right back. He would not say whether he was for Clark or Wilson.
