

ROSE DWORKIN RIDDLED WITH BULLETS THE MAN WHO TOLD—THEY'LL TRY HER FOR MURDER

Rose Dworkin, Simon her husband, and little Joe, born while his mother was a prisoner.

Cleveland, O., May 3.—They're going to try Rose Dworkin for murder.

She will face a jury soon with little Joe in her arms, the baby born after her arrest for killing Jacob Horwitz.

It's a life story pulsating with romance and shadowed by grim tragedy. Years ago, in a little Russian border village, lived Rose Shapiro, the belle of the whole countryside.

Jacob Horwitz wooed her, won her—and deserted without marrying her. He came to America, promising to send for her and the baby. Instead, he married over here.

Rose, after time had healed the wound, married Simon Dworkin, and with him crossed the ocean and settled in Massachusetts. Three children were born to them, and their wedded life was happy, until the shadow of Jacob Horwitz, then a prosperous Cleveland contractor, again fell over their way.

He sought again to win his cast-off sweetheart. Rose Dworkin rejected him. He threatened to expose her to her husband, but she remained firm.

Then Horwitz began telling Simon Dworkin, bit by bit, incidents in the life of Rose, and still tried to persuade Rose to be untrue to husband and children.

She still refused.

Then came the climax. Dworkin was told all—and telling it,
