

SISTER MUST BARE HER SHAME TO DEFEND BROTHER WHO KILLED MAN

Delilah Stephens and Her Brother, Emerson Hartman

Stockton, Cal., July 18.—A woman who is a wife, mother and sister must bare her shame in court to defend her brother, who committed murder to avenge her wrongs.

The woman sinned and told. The result: One man is dead and three lives are ruined—her own, her husband's and her brother's, not to mention the future of her two babies.

The story of the love affair between Delilah Stephens and Jack Duihan is one of ordinary folk. But into the tragedy of it is woven a maze of extraordinary situations, lifting it from a common plane to one of intense interest for students of humanity and its surprises.

A trace of the sordid, something of romance and a strong vein of religious faith are the three outstanding features that will be emphasized when the case goes to trial in September.

Sordidness on the part of Duihan, who was killed.

Romance in the attitude of the husband, Chris Stephens, who was willing to forgive and forget after his wife's confession.

Religious faith of the brother, Emerson Hartmann, who quotes the bi-
