was ended there was held an interesting and very animated reception at which Prince Bismarck presented to the emperor all the industrial and other non-military medals. Much was said in the course of the reception upon the point that the workingmen would not appreciate the interest that the emperor felt in their welfare and that gross ingratitude from them would be the only response to the effort to ameliorate their condition.

It is thought that during the elections for the Reichstag, the emperor's part of the country will be quiet. The meetings of the socialists everywhere are undisturbed. The police have been ordered to cease interfering with them.
