New York. — The artistic genius has changed according to people who keep close contact with out annual autumn rush of its claimants to this metropolis. Every fall they come, by the hundreds, or probably thousands, intent of finding fame and fortune here where they know there must be a welcome and opportunity for it. Most of them are girls, and they used to cause heartaches and worries to the kindly unofficial protectors of the young who tried to help them keep their heads above water in this maelstrom. They were "artists," they insisted and they would do nothing except such things as were consistent with their "art." Today, that superiority-consciousness seems vanished. The girls who crowd into our city to paint, act, or achieve distinction in any other art, are perfectly glad to sell blouses, answer a telephone or do anything else to supply food and shelter while they await Opportunity. In spite of the charges against "this awful generation," its budding geniuses have never been so sensible, we find.

of one of this publishing friends to sell books for the holiday rush. He took the place thinking it would give him first hand information on public taste in literature. One of his first customers was an obvious nouveau riche. She inquired for a "boy's story by an author whose name begins with O." Ernest was entirely facetious when he suggested Omar Kayham. "That's it," she said. She insisted on its being illustrated and he found a gorgeous edition bound in blue suede, illustrated by Dulac. She went through the print and the pictures carefully, and then said, "Well, I'll take it to him and see how he likes it. Still I don't know, he is reading red books this year, and he has a perfectly gorgeous collection." Ernest is satisfied with the connection for this one indication of taste.

"Merton of the Movies" had to be done into a play by Marc Connelly and George S. Kaufman. No one else I can think of except its original author, Harry Leon Wilson, could have tampered with it without endangering the deliciousness of its satire. And they have done it as well as we know they would. Glenn Hunter is the same patently absurd, heroic, Merton Gil, whom Harry Wilson created, and Florence Nash is perfect as "That Montague Girl." The acting helps to keep the play true to the book, but it was in the making of the play that things might easily have lost their values. So all of us who reveled in the comedy of the story give thanks.

Winifred Holt, young god-mother to the Lighthouse for the Blind, has done a thing which makes her hold upon our hearts stronger than ever. When invitations were issued for her marriage to Graves Mather, she asked all her friends to give only money as their wedding gifts; and that money is being turned over to the Lighthouse. Mr. Mather himself responded with a check for $3,500 which is already being used for her blind proteges, and the outside public was so appealed to by the idea than an anonymous check for five thousand dollars was received.

The opening of the new building of the American Art Association is an event notable in the art history of this country. The association started in 1883 in one little room when Thomas E. Kirby was asked by James F. Sutton to join him and R. Austin Robinson in forming the organization. Its new place on Madison avenue is one of the finest buildings of its kind in the world.
