Stony Brook was on the rampage during the night, and J. F. King says he thinks he has not seen so much evidence of water in the road along that stream since 1869. The bridge across the Marble brook, where the Italian camp was situated, was lifted, but was brought back into place and made passable early in the day. The roads were considerably washed in places, but there were no large items of damage. It was the biggest summer downpour in some years.
