

FEATURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

AUSTRIAN "NEW ART"

You come to a dead stop in front of the Austrian Pavilion and cannot pass it by if you try. Its modest body color, relieved by brilliant blues and gorgeous frescoes, causes it to stand out overwhelmingly prominent, and its severe though unique architecture contributes toward making the hall imperative.

It is usual to see the so-called "new art" of Austria, after you have stopped to survey the structure you will be worrying among your stray recollections for a clew to the "style" which confronts you. Is it Oriental, modern, ancient, or is it a freak? None and all of these, you will find.

The Austrian building offers the best opportunity on the grounds for a study of Impressionist painters. In the French section of the Fine Arts Palace and scattered here and there in other sections are lonely examples of such work.

Perhaps the greatest crowd since opening day attended the World's Fair yesterday on the occasion of Liberty Bell Day. It was Children's Day as well, as it by right should be, since the little ones had been the potent means of bringing the bell to the city.

Unofficial estimates of the attendance place it at between 135,000 and 150,000, many thousands of children taking advantage of the free admissions granted them by the Exposition in honor of the day, and in recognition of the part they played in it.

Chefoo, June 9, 10:30 a. m.—According to reports brought here by Chinese arrivals from Port Arthur, the outer forts of that place have been badly damaged by the Japanese bombardment.

Many buildings in the town have also been destroyed, but the inner forts have suffered but little. The Chinese appear to be unable to give any intelligent report on the condition of the Russian fleet, probably owing to the fact that they were not allowed in the vicinity of the naval basin.
