broilers are in tip-top shape to be sent to the markets. But still there are a few other things to be looked into before the broiler is ready to be passed into the hands of the consumer. A few rules, if carefully observed, will also help deliver these same broilers into the hands of the consumer in first-class condition: Give no feed for at least 36 hours. Pick dry and free from all pin feathers. Cool thoroughly before they are packed. Never sever the neck of a broiler that is intended for shipment. Never pack an inferior broiler in the same box with the good ones, as an inferior one will ruin the looks of the whole package.

Now, that the birds have been without feed for a period of 36 hours, we take each bird and insert its feet into a noose of stout twine which has been provided for the purpose and which is hung from some stout object and hangs about level with our shoulders. Take a killing knife and open the bird's bill and insert the knife into the seat of the brain and at the same instant give it a quick turn. This motion after a little practice severs the artery and benumbs the fowl at the same time. Now if we pull the large wing and tail feathers, we will find that they drop easily, but we will have to do this quickly as this period of dropping only lasts for about a minute, and we must make quick work of it. Carefully pick each bird, and wash out the mouth and remove all signs of blood.

During warm months pack carefully with small ice and just tight enough so that they will not slip and slide in transit. Cheap nice baskets are good to ship small lots in, for private customers, but if we ship in quantity, good boxes should be provided for same.

Your paper is doing a great work in this community. There were more two-horse plows bought and used last year, more seed selected through the ads in your paper and used than ever was used before. Everybody seems to be taking more interest in the new methods of farming and better seeds and a very large part of the credit belongs to The Progressive Farmer.—H. W. Weir, Weir, Miss.
