

VICKSBURG WEEKLY HERALD

Vol. V. Vicksburg, Mississippi, Saturday Morning, MARCH 5, 1870.

THE WEEKLY HERALD

PRINTED AT THE OFFICE OF WARREN CO. ADVERTISER, VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI.

JAS. H. SWORDS, Publisher. W. H. SPEARS, Editor.

SATURDAY, FEBRY 26, 1870.

TERMS OF THE VICKSBURG HERALD: DAILY SUBSCRIPTION: 2 Months, in Advance, $1.00; 3 Months, in Advance, $2.50; 6 Months, in Advance, $5.00; 1 Year, in Advance, $10.00. WEEKLY SUBSCRIPTION: 1 Year, in Advance, $1.00; 3 Months, in Advance, $2.50. ADVERTISING RATES: Single Column, per line, per week, 25 cents; Double Column, per line, per week, 50 cents.

OUR AGRICULTURAL PROSPECTS.

It affords us an ordinary pleasure to chronicle the bright prospects which Mississippi enjoys at this time so far as her material interests are concerned. The portals to prosperity have been opened, and we have only to wait for the consummation of the plans which have been managed thus far by wise, prudent and good men to witness for our State the happiest end to our national troubles. The people of this section are waking up from their slumbers, and the spirit of the age in which we live has been caught hold of by our most substantial men and soon we hope to see this rich and fertile land so long desolate from the ravages of the war, "bloom and blossom as the rose."

OUR AGRICULTURAL PROSPECTS.

It affords us an ordinary pleasure to chronicle the bright prospects which Mississippi enjoys at this time so far as her material interests are concerned. The portals to prosperity have been opened, and we have only to wait for the consummation of the plans which have been managed thus far by wise, prudent and good men to witness for our State the happiest end to our national troubles. The people of this section are waking up from their slumbers, and the spirit of the age in which we live has been caught hold of by our most substantial men and soon we hope to see this rich and fertile land so long desolate from the ravages of the war, "bloom and blossom as the rose."

REPUBLICAN MOBBITY.

A few days since Benjamin F. Whittemore—elected from the First Congressional District in South Carolina, through the persuasive eloquence of bayonet rule—was expelled from Congress because of his corruption, or rather it was not so much because of his corruption as his inability to conceal his villainy. That party does not attack any discredit to a member of it for corruptness; the want of it, however, would be an unpardonable sin, yet they dislike to see one of their number do an act of this kind in a bungling or unprofessional manner, and hence the earnest-bagger Whittemore was expelled. In other times it would have been a disgrace from which no man could ever hope to recover; his friends and family would all desert him and cast him forth an object of contempt, and the poor miserable creature would have either been forced to the commission of suicide or have become self-expatriated. Not so in the new era. Whittemore publicly declares that he intends to return to his constituents and ask for a re-election. This is the "new dispensation."

REPUBLICAN MOBBITY.

A few days since Benjamin F. Whittemore—elected from the First Congressional District in South Carolina, through the persuasive eloquence of bayonet rule—was expelled from Congress because of his corruption, or rather it was not so much because of his corruption as his inability to conceal his villainy. That party does not attack any discredit to a member of it for corruptness; the want of it, however, would be an unpardonable sin, yet they dislike to see one of their number do an act of this kind in a bungling or unprofessional manner, and hence the earnest-bagger Whittemore was expelled. In other times it would have been a disgrace from which no man could ever hope to recover; his friends and family would all desert him and cast him forth an object of contempt, and the poor miserable creature would have either been forced to the commission of suicide or have become self-expatriated. Not so in the new era. Whittemore publicly declares that he intends to return to his constituents and ask for a re-election. This is the "new dispensation."

REPUBLICAN MOBBITY.

A few days since Benjamin F. Whittemore—elected from the First Congressional District in South Carolina, through the persuasive eloquence of bayonet rule—was expelled from Congress because of his corruption, or rather it was not so much because of his corruption as his inability to conceal his villainy. That party does not attack any discredit to a member of it for corruptness; the want of it, however, would be an unpardonable sin, yet they dislike to see one of their number do an act of this kind in a bungling or unprofessional manner, and hence the earnest-bagger Whittemore was expelled. In other times it would have been a disgrace from which no man could ever hope to recover; his friends and family would all desert him and cast him forth an object of contempt, and the poor miserable creature would have either been forced to the commission of suicide or have become self-expatriated. Not so in the new era. Whittemore publicly declares that he intends to return to his constituents and ask for a re-election. This is the "new dispensation."

REPUBLICAN MOBBITY.

A few days since Benjamin F. Whittemore—elected from the First Congressional District in South Carolina, through the persuasive eloquence of bayonet rule—was expelled from Congress because of his corruption, or rather it was not so much because of his corruption as his inability to conceal his villainy. That party does not attack any discredit to a member of it for corruptness; the want of it, however, would be an unpardonable sin, yet they dislike to see one of their number do an act of this kind in a bungling or unprofessional manner, and hence the earnest-bagger Whittemore was expelled. In other times it would have been a disgrace from which no man could ever hope to recover; his friends and family would all desert him and cast him forth an object of contempt, and the poor miserable creature would have either been forced to the commission of suicide or have become self-expatriated. Not so in the new era. Whittemore publicly declares that he intends to return to his constituents and ask for a re-election. This is the "new dispensation."

REPUBLICAN MOBBITY.

A few days since Benjamin F. Whittemore—elected from the First Congressional District in South Carolina, through the persuasive eloquence of bayonet rule—was expelled from Congress because of his corruption, or rather it was not so much because of his corruption as his inability to conceal his villainy. That party does not attack any discredit to a member of it for corruptness; the want of it, however, would be an unpardonable sin, yet they dislike to see one of their number do an act of this kind in a bungling or unprofessional manner, and hence the earnest-bagger Whittemore was expelled. In other times it would have been a disgrace from which no man could ever hope to recover; his friends and family would all desert him and cast him forth an object of contempt, and the poor miserable creature would have either been forced to the commission of suicide or have become self-expatriated. Not so in the new era. Whittemore publicly declares that he intends to return to his constituents and ask for a re-election. This is the "new dispensation."

REPUBLICAN MOBBITY.

A few days since Benjamin F. Whittemore—elected from the First Congressional District in South Carolina, through the persuasive eloquence of bayonet rule—was expelled from Congress because of his corruption, or rather it was not so much because of his corruption as his inability to conceal his villainy. That party does not attack any discredit to a member of it for corruptness; the want of it, however, would be an unpardonable sin, yet they dislike to see one of their number do an act of this kind in a bungling or unprofessional manner, and hence the earnest-bagger Whittemore was expelled. In other times it would have been a disgrace from which no man could ever hope to recover; his friends and family would all desert him and cast him forth an object of contempt, and the poor miserable creature would have either been forced to the commission of suicide or have become self-expatriated. Not so in the new era. Whittemore publicly declares that he intends to return to his constituents and ask for a re-election. This is the "new dispensation."

REPUBLICAN MOBBITY.

A few days since Benjamin F. Whittemore—elected from the First Congressional District in South Carolina, through the persuasive eloquence of bayonet rule—was expelled from Congress because of his corruption, or rather it was not so much because of his corruption as his inability to conceal his villainy. That party does not attack any discredit to a member of it for corruptness; the want of it, however, would be an unpardonable sin, yet they dislike to see one of their number do an act of this kind in a bungling or unprofessional manner, and hence the earnest-bagger Whittemore was expelled. In other times it would have been a disgrace from which no man could ever hope to recover; his friends and family would all desert him and cast him forth an object of contempt, and the poor miserable creature would have either been forced to the commission of suicide or have become self-expatriated. Not so in the new era. Whittemore publicly declares that he intends to return to his constituents and ask for a re-election. This is the "new dispensation."

REPUBLICAN MOBBITY.

A few days since Benjamin F. Whittemore—elected from the First Congressional District in South Carolina, through the persuasive eloquence of bayonet rule—was expelled from Congress because of his corruption, or rather it was not so much because of his corruption as his inability to conceal his villainy. That party does not attack any discredit to a member of it for corruptness; the want of it, however, would be an unpardonable sin, yet they dislike to see one of their number do an act of this kind in a bungling or unprofessional manner, and hence the earnest-bagger Whittemore was expelled. In other times it would have been a disgrace from which no man could ever hope to recover; his friends and family would all desert him and cast him forth an object of contempt, and the poor miserable creature would have either been forced to the commission of suicide or have become self-expatriated. Not so in the new era. Whittemore publicly declares that he intends to return to his constituents and ask for a re-election. This is the "new dispensation."

REPUBLICAN MOBBITY.

A few days since Benjamin F. Whittemore—elected from the First Congressional District in South Carolina, through the persuasive eloquence of bayonet rule—was expelled from Congress because of his corruption, or rather it was not so much because of his corruption as his inability to conceal his villainy. That party does not attack any discredit to a member of it for corruptness; the want of it, however, would be an unpardonable sin, yet they dislike to see one of their number do an act of this kind in a bungling or unprofessional manner, and hence the earnest-bagger Whittemore was expelled. In other times it would have been a disgrace from which no man could ever hope to recover; his friends and family would all desert him and cast him forth an object of contempt, and the poor miserable creature would have either been forced to the commission of suicide or have become self-expatriated. Not so in the new era. Whittemore publicly declares that he intends to return to his constituents and ask for a re-election. This is the "new dispensation."

REPUBLICAN MOBBITY.

A few days since Benjamin F. Whittemore—elected from the First Congressional District in South Carolina, through the persuasive eloquence of bayonet rule—was expelled from Congress because of his corruption, or rather it was not so much because of his corruption as his inability to conceal his villainy. That party does not attack any discredit to a member of it for corruptness; the want of it, however, would be an unpardonable sin, yet they dislike to see one of their number do an act of this kind in a bungling or unprofessional manner, and hence the earnest-bagger Whittemore was expelled. In other times it would have been a disgrace from which no man could ever hope to recover; his friends and family would all desert him and cast him forth an object of contempt, and the poor miserable creature would have either been forced to the commission of suicide or have become self-expatriated. Not so in the new era. Whittemore publicly declares that he intends to return to his constituents and ask for a re-election. This is the "new dispensation."