THEY HADN'T BEEN INTRODUCED.

One Explanation of a Pretty Girl's Treatment of a Harlemite.

Every seat in the car was taken. At Twenty-third street a batch of shoppers bustled in. Most of them were women, and they all carried bundles more or less numerous and of various weights, shapes, and dimensions. Among them was an extremely pretty and well-dressed young woman. It was apparent, however, that she was aware of her points, and the manner in which she carried herself bore evidence to the fact that she was the recipient of much homage and adoration from the male sex at least. She glanced at the men in the seats as if expecting, as a matter of course, that one of them would get up and offer her his place. They had all of them looked at her, rather critically. But they all had become apparently very much absorbed in the contents of their evening newspapers a few moments later. To the careful observer, however, it was plain that they were much more interested in looking at the thing of beauty than they were in the news, judging from the games of peek-a-boo they were playing around the corners of their newspapers. But it was evidently a crowd of Harlemites, or why did an exceptionally pretty girl stand? From experience the Harlem business man has learned that it is better to let even youth and beauty stand than to take the risk of having youth and beauty get off at the next station while he loses his former seat and has to hang to a strap all the way to 125th street. This digression is to give the color of truth to the statement that a pretty girl stood.

The pretty girl had been standing for fully a minute and a half. She didn't seem to like it, and it irritated her as decidedly contrary to what she had been in the habit of expecting. Just then a young man who had been seated under the strap to which the pretty girl had been hanging arose, and, lifting his hat, asked her if she would accept his seat. The girl gave him a look which conveyed the impression that she wished it understood that he had taken a long time to come to his conclusion to get up for her, and that she was not at all pleased with his procrastination.

Just as she had settled herself in the seat the young man bent over her, and in a quiet but clear voice said:

"I beg your pardon, what did you say?"

"Nothing whatever, sir," returned the girl.

"Oh, excuse me," returned the young man, "I thought that you said 'Thank you.'"

And the other men came out from behind their newspapers, and each face wore a smile of self-justification.

AS SEEN FROM THE AMEN PEW.

Policeman Law, the Seeley Dinner, and the Private Citizen's Rights.

"The Seeley dinner," said the short, fat man in the Amen Pew at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, "has demonstrated one thing."

"What's that?" demanded two United States Senators, a few Congressmen, and the reporter.

"It's this," said the short, fat man. "It's demonstrated the necessity of an official definition of the legal powers of the police. I don't mean a definition by a Board of Police Commissioners, or by a congregation of Police Captains, or yet by a combination of hypocritical reformers who believe in getting men to commit crimes so that they can be arrested afterward. I mean it has shown the necessity of having the powers of the police defined by some legal authority that has the respect of the community."

"Amen," said the United States Senators and the Congressmen and the reporter. Ordinarily under the standing rule of the Amen Pew this would have settled the matter, and the subject would have changed automatically. But the short, fat man clogged the revolving wheels by continuing:

"Now let me elaborate. In the first place police interference in private affairs has reached a stage in this town that is hardly equalled anywhere in the world. Just think of it! It is contended in good faith by policemen that they have a right to go to your home or my home if they think the law is being violated there, and they have a right to force their way in. If they do not find any violation of the law and I complain of their invasion of my privacy, they say, 'Well, we'll show that we were justified in going to your house.' To do that they claim the right to subpœna me and anybody who happens to be in the house at the time they made their call. Not only do they claim the right to subpœna me, but they say they can keep us locked up in a room until they want to call us out and question us."

"They haven't any such right," thundered one of the United States Senators, and again there was a solemn "Amen" from the crowd.

"But they take it," said an artist who had joined the group. "I tell you it makes my blood boil."

He didn't get any further. No blood is ever permitted to boil in the Amen Pew, and the artist was squelched.

"You're right," said one of the Congressmen, when the artist was out of the way. "They take the right. We ought to have some definition of police powers. We've got to have it. But how are we going to get it?"

"Why not call on the District Attorney in this matter," suggested another Congressman. "I see by this afternoon's newspapers that the Police Commissioners are going to declare that Chapman was justified in arraigning at the theatre, and at the same time they are not going to ask for any indictments against the people who gave the dinner or any of the guests. I see, also, that the District Attorney is going to insist upon having a copy of the testimony in the case, and that he is going to have it all read by an assistant, to see if something can't be found on which an indictment against Mr. Seeley and his guests can be based. Now, why wouldn't it be better to present the whole matter to the Grand Jury and ask for indictments if anybody is guilty of any crime, and if not indictments, then a presentment. Let the Grand Jury look at all the evidence and let it say officially whether Capt. Chapman was justified. The Grand Jury is a body that all the citizens respect, let them just define the rights of the police in a case of this kind. Of course a presentment would not have any binding effect in law, but the moral effect would be great. If it was in favor of the police, the people would cool off. If it was against them, it would be a long time before a police Captain stepped over the bounds again."

The congregation nodded and said "Amen," and the Cuban question was taken up.

OLD MEN IN GREENWICH.

A Connecticut Town Where Old Age Is Green, Active, and Thriving.

GREENWICH, Conn., Jan. 23.—Some ten years ago William Reckefeller, who had a suburban home here, met, while walking one summer evening, the venerable Brush Knapp, then about 80 years of age. Mr. Knapp, who was a retired New York business man, was tall and of graceful figure, and walked with the elasticity and vigor of an athlete. His face had a tint a schoolgirl might have envied and age had not dimmed the brightness of his clear blue eyes.

"Tell me," said the Standard Oil magnate, "what elixir of life you have to make a youth of you in your old age."

"Only a clear conscience and the invigorating air of these beautiful hills and valleys," replied Mr. Knapp.

To-day there are more than a score of men living in Greenwich of 80 years or more whose energy and youthful appearance are as marked as were Mr. Knapp's, and there is no town in the State of Connecticut that can produce so many octogenarians as Greenwich. Mark Banks, who is 84 years of age, is seen every day at the Greenwich Savings Bank, where, until a few years ago, he held the office of Secretary and Treasurer. D. S. Mead, who will be 86 on his birthday in April, may be seen almost every day superintending the affairs of his farm. Isaac Weed, 96 years of age, was until recently actively engaged in his trade as boss carpenter. Sol Mead was not deterred by reason of his eighty-six years, from taking the journey to California and back alone two years ago, and he is seen almost every day walking on the Greenwich streets, rarely finding an overcoat necessary even on the coldest day. The Rev. B. M. Yarrington, who retired from the rectorship of Christ Church last year after fifty-six years of constant service, drives his spirited horse about Greenwich streets every pleasant day, the eighty-eight years he has lived resting lightly upon his broad shoulders. William Lawrence, erect, though 90 years old, who enjoys the distinction of having established the first plant in this country for securing vaccine virus, drives along in Greenwich and Stamford every day, and superintends his large farms with energy and business ability. Joseph Paige, who fired the cannon to salute the Marquis de Lafayette when the French soldier passed through this section after the Revolution, walks five or six miles every day with no signs of fatigue. Charles Mead, for more than forty years deacon in the Congregational church and now 85 years of age, thought it best to resign his post last fall and allow some of the younger men to take up the church duties. T. F. Secor is as erect to-day as when in 1860 his firm built the engines for many of the Government war vessels, though he is within two years of being 90 years old. Benj. Reynolds, who is 96, is compelled to remain at home because of an injured leg, but he is bright, and retains his faculties to a remarkable degree. There are many men here engaged in the active duties of life who are between 70 and 80 years of age, and would resent an intimation that they were old and unable to work, and they propose to keep busy as long as they have health and strength.

LESLIE DAY'S VINDICATION.

Sentenced as a Traitor to the British Government but Now Pardoned.

SPOKANE, Wash., Jan. 23.—Leslie Day, for nearly eight years a resident of this city and towns along the coast from San Francisco to Seattle, will start on Monday for England, his native country.

Twelve years ago Day was sentenced, at Sydney, N. S. W., to death on a charge of having given to the Russians secret information of a treasonable nature as to English fortifications; but his mother, after ten years of untiring effort, has secured for him vindication of the charge and full and free pardon. Day's mother was the daughter of a member of Parliament, and her son was marked for rank in the British foreign service. When a boy he was taken to Russia with her, and remained there some years. On reaching his majority, sixteen years ago, he came into much property, and went to New South Wales. There, through the influence of English connections, he secured contracts for the construction of the fortifications. While in this work he was accused of giving the Russian Foreign Office a copy of the plans of the defences on which he was engaged. He was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced as a traitor. While undergoing solitary confinement, preliminary to his expected execution, he escaped and reached a vessel which took him to Hawaii, and thence finally to San Francisco.

Since coming to this country an exile and a marked man Day has been one of the worst criminals on the west coast. He has been the terror of the police in every city from San Diego north. He is a powerful man, and his crimes have included almost everything on the calendar below the capital offences. About two years ago he came to Spokane, and has lived here since. Eighteen months ago he joined the Booth American Volunteers, and ever since has been a changed man. He expects to be in England in about three weeks.

EXEMPT, BUT SUMMONED AS JUROR

Three Times in a Year—The Summons Itself Set Forth His Exemption.

"Although I am exempt by law, I have been summoned for jury duty three times within about a year," said a New Yorker yesterday. "The summons always contains my profession, which is one of those exempted from service, as well as my name. Of course, I haven't been compelled to serve, but I object to being obliged, under penalty of $50 fine, to dance attendance at the Commissioner of Jurors' office within a specified time in order get exempted. Why am I not placed on the exempt list?

"This question at the Commissioner's office is met with the reply that perhaps I might have changed my business since the previous summer. Yet the summons names my business as the same. It reads in effect: 'You——who, by your occupation, here named, are exempt by law, are hereby summoned to appear before me, on or before——, in order that * * * you may have an opportunity to claim exemption from service, if you are entitled to exemption under any provision of the law.' Can anything be more ridiculous?"

INFORMATION ABOUT BARBERS.

Their Unions, Prices, Colleges, and Apprentices—Women as Barbers.

However they may get along together throughout the State and the United States, it is certain that the barbers of New York do not pull a good stroke together; and it is for that reason that the recent convention at Syracuse had no delegate from New York city.

The barbers in the neighborhoods where the poor live felt the necessity of united action in 1887 to protect themselves from ruinous cutting of rates by the Italians and the poorest of the Polish and Russian immigrants. So they formed the Journeymen Barbers' National Union of America. Its first President was Edward Finkleston. It seemed to catch on all right at the start, for it began with 800 members. But, alas for the victims of jealousy! Too many of them wanted to be President, and still more of them were unwilling to obey the commands of the union. In this way other associations, unions, leagues, guilds, and the like were formed, and thus the strength of the order was lost. The union is still in existence. Its President is Julius Gabler. But its ranks have been thinned from 800 to about 25 members.

A man in New York can be shaved at any price he wishes to pay, from 5 cents with a shine thrown in to 25 cents without it. A gentleman who confesses that he is fond of seeing all the different sides of life says that he has been shaved in every country in the world, and all over the city of New York, from the dirtiest place on the east side to the swellest place in the town. He affirms that, to a blind man, with not too keen a sense of smell, there is not much difference.

A New York barber does not particularly object to having a college graduate, but he draws the line at recognizing as a competent workman the graduate of a college of barbers. In such colleges, says President Gabler, they take a young man and in six weeks at a cost of $25 to the pupil, profess to turn out a competent workman, whereas it really requires three years to learn the trade. These colleges not only graduate their pupils in six weeks, but they also give them a set of tools and agree to find them a job.

"What is a set of tools?" President Gabler was asked.

"Oh, about a dozen good razors that will cost $1.50 apiece, lather brushes, mugs, combs, and brushes. A man might get along with half a dozen razors, but when trade is brisk he has no time to stop and sharpen his razor."

"How does an apprentice learn to shave a man?"

"Well, he gets a job in some place and keeps his eyes open. Suppose the boss has three chairs. One he will stand at himself, and one will be attended by his journeyman barber. After the boss has finished shaving his man the boy can wash his face and comb his hair, or he can lather the face of the newcomer, and get him ready for the boss or the other barber to shave. Then, once in a while a good-natured man comes along who knows the boy is trying to learn the trade, and he will say, 'Well, go ahead and see what hand at shaving me you can make.' But mostly it is the boss himself that comes in for the torture of the efforts of the apprentice. Then there are men who learn to shave fairly well by commencing on themselves when there are only a few soft hairs to get off. It is a peculiar fact that generally when a man has a good heavy beard he has a tender skin. That man needs a barber who knows his business. The observing, experienced barber can tell a tender skin by the looks of it."

The journeymen barbers of New York get from $6 to $15 a week, according to where they work, and some of them shave on a commission. The boss generally gives them about half what the customers pay. There are more women barbers than formerly. The barber who gave this information was asked what he thought of women as barbers. He said:

"I see no reason why women should not be barbers, and good barbers at that. It is not a work requiring great strength. It is a kind of skilled labor at which I should think women might become expert. There is no doubt in my mind that in the future more and more of them will go into the business."

BLOOD AND SKIN HUMORS

Afflicting a Whole Family. Speedily Cured by CUTICURA.

Statements Sworn to Before the Clerk of the Supreme Court.

My wife had appear on her limbs, just above the ankles, five small pimples that began to enlarge, and soon developed into eating ulcers of the indolent type, which, despite all remedies and our efforts to cure them, grew worse and worse, and at the end of three months had become very bad, two of them having eaten to the bone. At that time we began to use CUTICURA remedies, and with two bottles of RESOLVENT, one box of CUTICURA, and one cake of CUTICURA SOAP, they were cured sound and well in about two months. The scars are there to-day as living witnesses of the severity and extent of the ulcers.

I also was afflicted the same winter with papular rash, from which I could not rest day or night. My skin became in a very bad fix when I began using CUTICURA remedies. I used them for about one month and was cured.

My little baby girl, when about ten months old, was afflicted with Eczema, her limbs from her knees down were one solid sore from which she suffered greatly. We tried several remedies which only aggravated them, before we began the use of the CUTICURA remedies, in which case there was a complete cure with no return of the disease.

THE PEBBLE ON THE BEACH.

The Origin of the Expression Now Popular in This City.

"You're not the only pebble on the beach," is an expression which has been made familiar on the stage in variety theatres of New York and other cities since last summer and it is traceable to no more substantial origin than a chance remark of one female duettist to another, with whom she had quarrelled in Coney Island, and a more masculine variation of the original remark is to be found in the expression, "You're not the only cinder in the heap." A chance expression, having some claim to enduring popularity to California and back alone two years ago, and he is seen almost every day walking on the Greenwich streets, rarely finding an overcoat necessary even on the coldest day. The Rev. B. M. Yarrington, who retired from the rectorship of Christ Church last year after fifty-six years of constant service, drives his spirited horse about Greenwich streets every pleasant day, the eighty-eight years he has lived resting lightly upon his broad shoulders. William Lawrence, erect, though 90 years old, who enjoys the distinction of having established the first plant in this country for securing vaccine virus, drives along in Greenwich and Stamford every day, and superintends his large farms with energy and business ability. Joseph Paige, who fired the cannon to salute the Marquis de Lafayette when the French soldier passed through this section after the Revolution, walks five or six miles every day with no signs of fatigue. Charles Mead, for more than forty years deacon in the Congregational church and now 85 years of age, thought it best to resign his post last fall and allow some of the younger men to take up the church duties. T. F. Secor is as erect to-day as when in 1860 his firm built the engines for many of the Government war vessels, though he is within two years of being 90 years old. Benj. Reynolds, who is 96, is compelled to remain at home because of an injured leg, but he is bright, and retains his faculties to a remarkable degree. He Was Caught in a Bear Trap.

Jim Robel was rabbit hunting near Marsfield, Wis., the other day with Joe Schweck. The two men separated after a while, walking along parallel routes to put up their game and scare it toward each other. Schweck suddenly heard a yell from Robel. The yell came in jerks, as if from a man much out of breath. Schweck went in the direction of the yell and found Robel dangling by his heels from a big sapling top, to which a rope was fastened. Some one had set a snare for bear and Robel had touched the trigger. He was rescued.

Modern Baggage.

The bicycle trunk, a novelty only a few years ago, is now a more or less familiar article of baggage. There are some bicycle trunks made to carry two. There is also made for the safe carrying of individual bicycles a wicker trunk, which is shaped as is the ordinary bicycle trunk, but made of willow basket work. Then there are made of collapsible crates, in which a bicycle may be carried to the seashore or the country.
