

TRADE IN FAR EAST DEPENDS ON PEOPLE

Governments Less Important Than Private Citizens, Says Thomas W. Lamont.

TELLS OF CONSORTIUM How Japan Finally Joined America, Britain and France to Help China.

The maintenance of American trade in the Far East and the success of the consortium of nations which has been formed to give financial assistance to China depends not so much on governments as on people, according to Thomas W. Lamont...

Japan Changes Views.

"I am informed that in the two years it has taken to form the consortium the Japanese have changed their views on the governments of the United States, Great Britain, France and Japan. It is also known that in the viewpoint as to China the attitude of our government, of the British and of the French have from the start been a unit and that for some time Japanese views did not fully coincide with those of the other three governments. Now, happily, Japan has come to see eye to eye with the other governments on this question of the Chinese consortium, and I believe that to-day they are a unit in respect to the consortium.

Only the First Step Taken.

"We must remember the formation of the consortium, now about Japan has decided to take the first step in a long and arduous pathway. The banking groups themselves will have to display toward one another great patience, great tolerance. Conditions never function readily. International partnership always prove difficult. But in the fact that we are all engaged in one enterprise and with one principle in view ought to weld us together and make our common success. But in order to reach that happy end we must accept the cooperation of all good American citizens. From your study of world problems you are especially well equipped to give thought, aid and counsel to the question of America's relations to Japan and to China—the Far East generally.
