MR. BROWN'S LAST ASCENT.

One fine summer morning, a few years since, there was wonderful excitement in the Irish village of Ballydooley.

scars, plasters or bandages. In practicing gymnastic he knocked out three teeth, in catching at Cows he had been four times nearly drowned—and in shooting on the moors in Scotland he had left the groins unharmed, but had blown off two of his own fingers.

Both hands and held him suspended over the side of the boat. In another moment he would have dropped him into the abyss of space.

in the thinking of an eye. They crossed the seven metres of ground which separated them from the enemy at a few bounds—they drifted as lightly and quietly as autumn leaves before the wind, and in a minute or two after the head of their columns issued from the ditch.

but some had been left behind in the hands of the dead or wounded men, and others had been broken, so that if one can credit the statements made by those who were present there were not more than six or seven leaders at the assault.

Brothers and Sisters.—Brothers! Sisters! blessed names; are they not worth cherishing in this world of sunshine and shadow? Do we not love them, though angry words may sometimes soil our lips to their faults, more afterwards repent-
