HEARTBREAKS DEALT OUT BY SCHOOLROOM CLIQUES

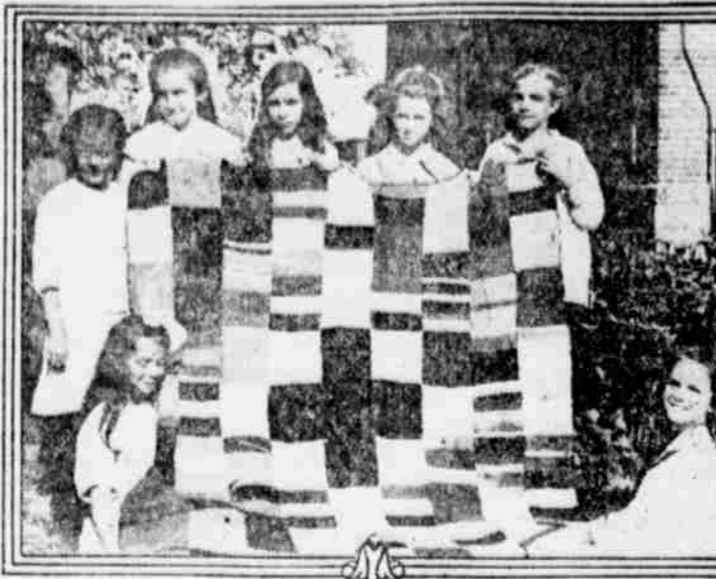

Why the Girl Left Out of the Crowd Should Be Big Enough to Laugh and Look Ahead—What the Clique Amounts to in After Life

THERE is a war that always goes on even when days are full of peace. It is one of the biggest things a girl ever has to face, or at least it seems that way to the girl who is left out of the crowd. I speak of the schoolroom clique.

CHAPTER II The House in the Alley

THE Mystery Man was half way down the block when Peggy and Blue Jay followed him around the corner.

- 1. A brand-new supply of old-fashioned fountain-pen ink bottles. 2. Fountain-pen ink bottles. 3. A novel little bird that is a tea-pot holder.

DOWN in old Virginia they still resort to the old-fashioned method of crushing corn between stones.

"Fountain pens should always be filled with specially prepared fountain pen ink," you read, and some day you happen to see some, and so you purchase a bottle.

"Here are some groceries," it was saying. "These will keep you from getting hungry, and when your father gets better maybe I can help him find a job."

"I have a piece of bread yesterday morning," spoke up a boy's treble. "But sister Helen hasn't had anything since the day before."

"Then you pitch right into this meal," Helen brought out the gruff voice. "Not another word until you're filled up."

At a table inside were a little boy and girl eating away as fast as they could. The boy was eating a hot dog and a bowl with a man with his head bandaged.

A Maid and Two Men

The Story of the Girl Who Was Left Behind By HAZEL DEYO BATHLOR

Copyright, 1918, by Public Ledger Co.

"WELL, you won't do it with my money, and that's certain," Mr. Brander, his face purple with repressed anger, eyed his daughter across the dinner table.

"To think of it!" said Mrs. Brander, almost in a wall, "after all we've done for her!"

Helen sat at the side of the table in silence. There was no one else in the dining room at that moment.

"Haven't you anything to say for yourself?" stormed Mr. Brander again.

"Hush, Will! you'll have the servants gossiping," Mrs. Brander, anxious always to preserve appearances, was quick to add here.

Soft-footed Theresa entered at that moment to remove the soup plates, and Helen sat in silence.

"The girls are all fools," said Mrs. Brander, venomously. "Ruth Rowland began all this with Helen. She used to have a grain of common sense before that."

"Did you hear me?" Mr. Brander said, turning to Helen again. "I say you can't do it."

"You didn't say that, father—that I am going and not with your money."

"And whose money is going to take you over? Who is going to finance this ridiculous trip of yours?" sneered Mr. Brander.

"I'm going on a salary," Helen looked up and met her father's eyes squarely.

"What an organization that is sending women overseas!"

Helen looked up and met her father's eyes squarely. She had always dreaded looking into those eyes from the time when she had been a small girl.

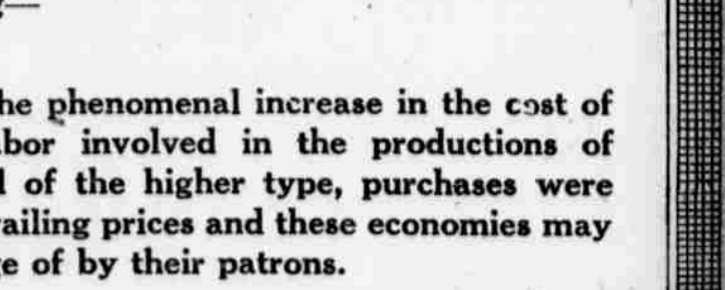

"I'll stay at her in amusement, and you can have as much as you like of the extra touches which make her afternoon tea particularly delightful and different."

When Theresa once more left the room Mr. Brander was calmed down to the extent of turning the roast, and it wasn't until it had been served and they were alone once more that the conversation was resumed.

"And why, pray, have I no right to speak to you that way?" This sudden opposition to his will from a member of his own household was strange enough to be interesting.

"Because I gave you no reason for doing it. I have the right to do as I like with my own life. I think it best to come home to live after Jim's death."

JACKIE'S BIT By Ethel V. Hall

LITTLE Jackie sat on the top rail of the fence, wondering how he could do his bit. To be sure he was a tiny bit, but he was a very nervous boy.

"I'm not a man, I'm a boy," said the man. "I'm a very nervous boy and I am very much worried about it."

"Where are you going?" Jackie asked, looking at the man who was standing in front of the house.
