The Speed of the Trotter.

Thirty years ago two minutes and forty seconds was regarded as the extreme limit of speed for a mile in the trotting races. To have ventured the prediction at that time that it would be done even in twenty-two, would have been to receive merciless derision. For a mile to be trotted in two minutes would have seemed then as fanciful as the famous flight of Flying Childers in the days when no time was taken in England and few watches existed, and yet it is not only probable that two minutes will soon be the record, but that the trotting horse may eventually reach the speed of the running racer.

The time record of the trotter has been lowered almost by regular gradations, averaging at least a second a year, while the running record, except in one or two rare instances, has not changed materially since the days of Boston, Fashion and Henry, Jr. If the Flying Childers myth be accepted, it has vastly deteriorated within a hundred and fifty years. Of course it is possible that the running record may undergo as great changes as that of the trotter, but the argument is decidedly against it.

Running has always been the fastest gait of the horse, and the best of these animals have been for hundreds of years trained for it, and brought to perfection within the limits of the knowledge possessed on the subject, while trotting has been taken up recently as a form of racing, and by careful selection and training the gait has been altered until it differs as much from that of forty years ago as the forced amble of a mule from the swinging gallop of a thoroughbred horse. The gait is a new one, and is capable of still further improvement. It is this which diverts the splendid efforts of recent trotters of surprise.

Had persons fairly followed the history of the trotting turf they would have seen no grounds for astonishment in the performances of such animals as Dexter, St. Julien, Maud S., Sunol, and the splendid burst of speed of Nancy Hanks. Indeed, there need be no surprise if this new record of the turf brings down the record of the two-minute mark within a year. She will be followed by others who will beat her record, just as she has beaten all of those which have been famous heretofore. It is the improvement in the new gait, by careful selection and training, which accomplishes these wonderful results, and the limit may not be reached until the speed of the trotter equals that of the race horse.

Contentment. Given all the comforts and many of the luxuries of life, how many people are discontented solely from a habit of comparing their lot with those of more fortunate acquaintances! They do not specially object to walking—they like the exercise—but, whenever their next-door neighbor's carriage dashes by them, they grow suddenly tired about the knees and feel a weakness in the back with which pedestrianism does not agree. Woolen gowns would be perfectly comfortable if silk ones never rustled in front of them. John Smith's brick house is better than he ever expected to own, and he would be content enough with it if Tom Jones, who went to school with him when he was a boy, had not moved into a one-fronted mansion with handsome portico.
