

ROBERTS JAILED BY CARRANZA MEN

Thrown in Piedras Negras Jail While at Luncheon; McClure Gets Release.

John W. Roberts, staff correspondent of the Hearst news syndicate, arrived in El Paso Friday night after an exciting experience in Brownsville and Eagle Pass, when he was placed in jail by Carranza officials.

Roberts, it will be remembered, is charged with being the man who "put Villa over." The Carranzistas have not forgotten that. That's why Roberts had an exciting experience.

With S. S. McClure. When on his way to El Paso two weeks ago, Mr. Roberts received a telegram from S. S. McClure, publisher of McClure's Magazine and the New York Evening Mail, asking him to wait in San Antonio. Mr. McClure wanted to get some inside history of the Villa-Carranza split.

Invited to Cross. First chief Carranza finally arrived in Piedras Negras. Arrangements were immediately made to have all the correspondents at Eagle Pass attend a dinner given by General Carranza.

him shot, made the Hearst correspondent suspicious. "I'm pinched," he whispered to his companions. "Follow me." Mr. Acuna was nowhere to be found and Roberts was led under a double guard to the military prison, relieved of his belongings and placed in a cell.

Carranza Stubborn. "The first chief was stubborn," said Mr. Roberts. "Mr. Stillman reiterated his demand, pointing out the fact that I had been invited over to Piedras Negras and, furthermore, that I am an American citizen. It was not until a telegram from secretary Robert Lansing arrived, however, demanding my immediate release that Carranza issued the necessary instructions to liberate me.

Grinning Maniac. "They threw me into a four by five cell," added Roberts, Saturday. "With not even a seat, much less blankets. Outside in the patio of the jail was a maniac who kept pushing his nose in through the bars of my window to laugh at me diabolically. Every little while he would purse his big, black lips and say: 'Besame; besame.' (Kiss me.) I had nothing to throw at him so I lit a match and stuck it in his face. This kept him away."
