LOCAL FOREST DISTRICT MAY BE INCREASED

Petitions to Congress Ask for Inclusion of Million Acres to District 4 Territory

Awaiting only the formal action of congress, steps taken by western livestock men and associated interests to procure the inclusion of approximately a million acres of improved grazing and timber lands and watershed areas under the jurisdiction of the Ogden forest service offices, have reached the point that they are virtually assured.

This was the announcement this morning of R. E. Gery, in charge of the office of lands of District 4 forest service headquarters in this city.

Petitions circulated throughout Utah, Idaho, Nevada and Wyoming, have gone forward to Washington where, according to reports received by forest men they have received a favorable reception, and it has been intimated that favorable action will follow.

These petitions seeking the additions are the outcome of range trouble of livestock raisers whose summer range was used and depleted by stock shipped from other sections. The area totals 1,000,000 acres.

AVAILABLE LANDS: In every section, however, the sections recommended for addition included timbered lands that should be under forest service protection, and which were also invaluable for watershed purposes.

The granting of the petitions, stock experts declare, will mark one of the biggest steps ever taken in the west towards the stabilizing of the cattle industry. With a million and more acres of properly supervised range, added to the present range area, the cattle situation in the four states should be materially relieved, at least in such sections of the state where additions are made, Mr. Gery said.

In Idaho and Wyoming, no addition can be made except by an act of congress, followed by a proclamation by the president. In Utah and Nevada a proclamation by the president is all that is necessary to authorize an addition of the public domain lands to the forest service.

With possibly one exception, every addition of land could be handled by the present machinery of the forest service, by enlarging ranger districts.

The largest addition petitioned for has been made by settlers in the vicinity of the Lemhi forest in Idaho. This addition includes approximately 407,000 acres. The greater portion of this land affords excellent watershed and is covered with the best timber growth.

OTHER ADDITIONS: Another addition, to the Targhee and Lemhi forests in Idaho, which has been pending for some time, includes 52,240 acres.

On the Minidoka forest in Idaho, two sections including approximately 85,000 acres have been presented for approval. The additions to the Minidoka forest are what are locally known as the Goose Creek and the Bannock Mountain divisions of the forest.

A proposed addition to the Caribou forest in Idaho, including a large acreage, has been passed by congress and is now awaiting proclamation by the president.

On the Boise forest in Idaho, an addition of ten townships representing an acreage of 239,040 acres, all of which are in the proximity of Idaho City, is contemplated.

In Utah, it is proposed that six townships, 133,240 acres, be added to the Wasatch and Ashley forests. This land lies immediately north of the two forests, and a portion of it extends into Wyoming.

UINTAH FOREST: On the Uintah forest, an addition of 35,000 acres has been petitioned for and an addition of 55,000 acres to the Wyoming National Forest is also contemplated. The last mentioned land lies along the eastern boundary of the Wyoming National Forest.

It is expected that petitions from Nevada will be made asking for millions of public domain to forest service lands in that state.

The additions come directly under the forest service program of conservation and besides offering decided advantages to cattle growers, also protect timber interests of the nation. At present, it is stated, the United States is using considerably more timber than it produces. The land additions will throw more than a million acres of timbered lands under forest service protection from fire, indiscriminate cutting and other destroying forces, while under the grazing administration of the forest service, the range included in the addition will not be depleted by improper usage.
