

THE DAY OF THE FUNERAL.

All that the pomp and circumstance of a nation's sorrow can do to testify to a nation's horror of the atrocious crime which has snatched the President from the midst of his labors, and the harvest of our hopes will this day be done. The tolling of bells, the doleful boom of artillery, the trappings of woe investing all homes, "sonorous metal blowing martial sounds," nothing will be wanting; and all will but feebly utter the deep universal sense that, while in the loss of our President we have suffered a grievous political calamity, in the manner of that loss every principle of our national system, every tradition of our honorable past, every hope of future peace and glory for us as a nation, has been most wickedly and most wantonly outraged.

In that deep universal sense of the grander impersonal aspects of this day's solemnities, their highest and most vital significance must be found. Grief, above all the grief of a nation, should be, like a nation's joy.

"Majestic, equable, sedate,
Confirming, cleansing, raising, making free."

Wise men were troubled most when Washington died, the orb of his life sinking calmly and gently through its golden west, to reflect how greatly the nation had owed to him alone, to the personal qualities and virtues of his single nature, its safety and its peace.

Standing, as we do to-day, about the tomb of his successor, upon whom, after he had scorned delights and lived laborious days in the service of the state he was called to rule and guide, came and clipt his thin-spun life in the very hour of the approaching fruition of his efforts and his devotion; the temper and measure of our mourning must determine whether we sorrow as men without hope, or wisely and to some ripe end.

In the grave of our murdered President, just men of all parties and shades of opinion this day bury, so far as he is concerned, the bitternesses and extravagances born of political conflict about his measures and his policy.—N. Y. World.

The arrest in Boston of Joseph H. Borland, a boot and shoe merchant of Pittsburg, for stating that he was acquainted with John Wilkes Booth's intention to kill the President, was mentioned a few days ago. The Boston Herald, of Monday, says:

He repeated his declarations that Booth had told him within a short time that he meant to shoot the President, and also that he was, since that time, in company with him at Edward's pistol gallery, where he (Booth) was practicing pistol firing in difficult positions, etc. After his incarceration in the Tombs, Borland changed his story, denying that he had ever seen John Wilkes Booth, or that he ever knew there was such a person. These statements are manifestly untruths.

The Negroes at Work

The following is an extract from an order issued by General Ludlow, commanding the Peninsula district, comprising the counties immediately north of the James River:

"It has come to the knowledge of the authorities that the negroes on the different farms are refusing to work, for are leaving their accustomed homes, and coming into Richmond and other places occupied by troops. They are hereby directed to remain at their old homes, to go to work as usual on the farms, and raise the produce necessary for their maintenance and are assured that their freedom shall be protected."
"B. C. LUDLOW,
"Br't Brig. Gen. Commanding."

Schools for colored children are about to be established in Richmond.

Gen. Washburne, considering the war as virtually ended, has resigned his commission.
