SCRUBS MUST GO.

No Stockman Who Sticks to Them Can Reasonably Expect to Make Both Ends Meet.

Scrub stock is not always bred that way. The best and bluest blood known to breeders may be made to bring forth progeny of the scrub order by carelessness on the part of the feeder.

The old saying that "well fed is half bred" is not merely a saying. It is founded on truth, and as a statement is quite exact. The veriest scrub may be made quite respectable by proper feeding, but it can never be made a pure-bred animal. It has not in it the quality to assimilate feed and put it to good use that is inherited by the pure-bred animal, and the feed given to it will never produce the results that would have been shown if the care and skill that lies behind the pure-bred beast had had some part in making it up.

There is no excuse for scrub stock whether bred or made so by carelessness. Scrubby horses or cattle mark the owner as being at once non-progressive and ill-fitted for breeding or feeding. A man may not be financially able to stock his farm with pure-bred stock, but even the poorest farmer may command the services of good sires and in this way secure the benefits of good blood. The first remove from a scrub where a pure-bred sire is used shows an improvement, and four removes will generally produce an animal that will pass for a high grade and possessing the good qualities of the breed it has been graded up with.

Happily, the day of bred scrubs is about past. Very few genuine "penny royal" steers are to be found now, and each year they become fewer. The scrub made so by lack of care and careless feeding is still too much in evidence. It will not disappear as long as corn stover is left in the field for cattle to forage on during the winter. No profit can result from any kind of scrubs, and the man who allows them to remain on his farm and continue to be scrubs will be the one who is ready to testify that there is no chance for him to make both ends meet.—Farmer's Voice.

HAULING SORGHUM.

A Kansas Farmer Describes a Contrivance for Drawing the Hay to the Stack.

We use a home-made implement for hauling it from the windrow to the stack. The name it goes by here is the go-devil. To make one, get three joists eight inches wide and 12 feet long; four soantlings 2x4; cut the 2x4 in different lengths from four to seven feet long; take seven of these pieces and sharpen one end so that they will pass under the hay and not catch in the ground; lay one of the 12-foot pieces down for the head, cut two pieces one foot long and lay one at each end of the long joist. Then lay on the seven teeth, placing the long one in the middle, see cut, and the shortest ones at the end, then the others between the middle and the end ones. Then fit pieces from the eight-inch joist between the teeth as tight as possible; then lay the other joist on top of the teeth; bore holes through the upper and lower joist and the teeth; put good stout bolts through them and the teeth.

At the end, outside of the teeth, shove a collar round so that a chain can work loose on it and not slip off the end. Bore a few two-inch holes in the head and put in stakes to prevent the hay slipping off behind. Fasten a chain or rope ten feet long to each end; hitch a horse to each end; let a boy ride each horse; go to the end of the windrow; have a man to stand on the go-devil to manage it; start the horses along the windrow until you get a load, then draw it to the stack; turn the horses and pull it backwards until it is clear of the load.—D. M. Adams, in Ohio Farmer.

Place for Early Lambs.

I do not fancy the basement for the breeding ewes, but I do think that it is just the place for the lambs, especially during early lambhood. At this time they require a warm, even temperature as much as anything, and I don't know of a better place for these features than in a well arranged and lighted basement barn. If one has no intention of raising winter or early spring lambs, it is obvious that the basement will not be of any material value; but in this climate where one expects to rear early stock at a minimum expense, it is a very important feature. The most successful sheep growers that I know are able to take advantage of a basement or its equivalent.—National Stockman.

Plenty of Salt for Stock.

All kinds of farm stock should have salt where they can get to it at will. Rock salt placed under shelter should be kept before them at all times. Besides this, stock should have a small amount of loose salt twice a week. None of the animals will eat too much salt if it is kept before them constantly. Salt stimulates the appetite, assists digestion and assimilation and increases the flow of the fluids of the body. Where stock has not had a sufficient supply of salt, begin gradually and feed up. An overdose acts as a poison.—Orange Judd Farmer.

Never feed any animal more than it can eat up clean.

SIMPLE SENSE

There is a right way to do all things. An expectant mother can easily realize, if she stops to think a moment, how dangerously wrong it is to swallow medicines when in her condition. which she can depend upon doing her a world of good before and during labor. Send to us for our free illustrated book, "Before Baby is Born." Mother's Friend is sold in drug stores for $1 a bottle, or from
