THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY

In a spirit of rededication to the pursuit of wisdom and service to society, The University of Chicago will celebrate, in the year 1966 and the spring of 1967, the Seventy-fifth Anniversary of its founding.

With gratitude and humility the University will note, during the Anniversary, the achievements of its first three-quarters of a century, reaffirming the faith of its founders that where learning really flourishes, the whole of life is enriched. Rededication in a world of infinite change and challenge implies the study of educational principle and practice, of modes and conditions of inquiry, and, above all, of the responsibilities of a great university to society. Accordingly, The University of Chicago has adopted as its theme for the Anniversary Year "The Conditions and Purposes of the Modern University."

Throughout the Anniversary, conferences, symposia, and publications will explore many of the gravest problems of both the academic community and the society which it serves. At its Convocations and other ceremonies, the University will honor those to whom the present state of man's knowledge owes much.

Those bound by personal interest and sentiment to The University of Chicago are encouraged to make the Anniversary an occasion for the strengthening of these bonds. Universities, colleges, learned societies, and other institutions of education and culture are invited to participate, through their representatives, in those ceremonies which signify our common dedication. The University will rejoice in the presence of all men and women who, in a concerned, inquiring, and humane spirit, look to the future with high seriousness and hope. Invitations will be issued in due season, and a most cordial welcome is assured to all those who honor the University with their company.
